Fall Seeding Conserves Feed

With many herds getting almost winter rations of hay or silage during much of July and August, a scarcity of these feeds is likely to occur before the pasture season next spring. Assurance of a good supply of fall pasture will help to overcome this scarcity to some extent. It is doubtful if dried-out, overgrazed pastures will produce too well now, even with rain, and heavy grazing of alfalfa during the fall months will seriously reduce the volume of hay or pasture next year.

A mixture of oats and fall rye, one bushel of oats, one and a half bushels of rye per acre, seeded now will make good fall pasture and reduce the load on permanent pastures and meadows. It will take from three to four weeks after seeding before it is ready to pasture. The oats grow faster than the rye, so pasturing can start sooner than if only rye were sown. If the field is early and well drained, the rye will provide early spring pasture.

The catch of new seeding will probably depend on favourable weather for the rest of the fall. At present, it doesn't look too good. Faced with the prospect of failure of this spring's seeds, some farmers are considering fall seeding to be sure of a hay crop next summer. The success of fall seeding will likely depend on favourable weather for growth in the fall, and not too severe a winter. Seeding can be without a nurse crop or with a very light seeding of oats, which will give some protection and then die over winter. If attempting a fall seeding for the first time, remember these points:

1. Grasses are likely to be more successful than clovers. Timothy, Orchardgrass, Bromegrass and Ryegrass are suitable. Red Clover, Alsike, Sweet lover or Alfalfa can be used in the mixture and with favourable conditions will survive.
2. Seed as early as possible to get the greatest possible growth and root development this fall.
3. Use a liberal amount of suitable fertilizer to assist in getting a good stand.
4. Seed shallow, on a well prepared, firm seed bed.
