LICE IN SHEEP The irritation associated with an infestation of lice in sheep may be so severe as to seriously interfere with feeding and resting. As a result animals may fail to put on condition and young sheep particularly may be stunted in growth. Most important, however, is the fact that infested animals constantly rub against objects and scratch and bite at themselves and as a result the wool becomes ragged and torn. Two kinds of lice may infest sheep, the biting louse and the sucking or foot louse. In Canada only the biting louse is of importance. The insect may occur on any part of the body, but is usually found on those parts covered with wool. Once present in a flock, lice spread very rapidly. Undoubtedly most of the infestation occurs through direct contact with lousy animals, but clean sheep may become infested from buildings where lousy animals have been housed. As all lice live continuously on their host, the main emphasis in treatment must be placed on the affected animal. Despite this it is always advisable to clean out the bedding when control measures are undertaken. A variety of commercial preparations are available for the treatment of sheep infested with lice. These depend on their effectiveness on a number of different drugs including rotenone, DDT, lindane, methoxychlor and others. The manufacturer's instructions, particularly in regard to amounts must be followed exactly.
