HEALTH UNIT WARNS OF WHOOPING COUGH

Whooping cough is especially dangerous for infants and young children. Many cases occur in infants of six months of age or less and most deaths from whooping cough before three years of age. In older children, while the disease may not be so severe, there is still the long drawn out convalescence with its nights of difficult coughing.
Symptoms
The main symptom is a dry persistent cough ending in a whoop which may go on for weeks and weeks. The coughing may be accompanied by vomiting resulting in loss of food and loss of weight. It may then be necessary to give the child frequent light meals. Whooping cough is very contagious and a frequent complication is pneumonia. Whenever whooping cough is suspected, the family physician should be called immediately.
Isolation
The isolation period for the disease is twenty-one days from the onset of the disease. If other children in the family under twelve years of age have not had whooping cough, they are quarantined for the same period of isolation of the patient. The infection, spread by direct contact, usually takes about ten days to develop, but may take longer.
Protection
The injections to prevent whooping cough are usually given in combination with diphtheria and tetanus toxoid. They should be given any time after three months of age, with boosters during the second and third years. This provides protection in over 80% of children. In the remaining 20%, if the disease is contracted, it is usually a milder case.
(The above information is published in pamphlet form by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and may be obtained at your local York County Health Unit office.)
