A snapshot of the bride and groom cutting the wedding cake is essential to your picture-story. Arrange it carefully and take two or three shots to make sure you will have a good one.

Make Your Wedding Pictures Tell a Story

Of all the occasions that call | 35mm cameras that give you for pictures, surely a wedding is one of the most important. And a wedding is a natural for a connected picture story.

The formal pictures will probably be taken by a professional photographer, but that won't prevent the amateur fans from clicking their cameras, too. If you are one of these amateurs and one of the principals is a relative or close friend, you might make a picture story your wedding gift. If so, you can be sure that it will be among the most treasured gifts they will receive whether your story is in black-and-white or color, in color slides or in movies.

For many of us, the inexpensive snapshot camera is the one we know best. We know that all we have to do is to get the picture we want into the viewfinder and press the shutter - release gently to avoid any camera movement.

With our flash attachments, we know we can get some good interior shots in the church, at the reception and at home whether we're using black-and-white or color film, and that a flash-bulb is good for fill-in lighting when we are taking shots outdoors.

There are, of course, other types of cameras that are almost as easy to use such as the | 22 such wonderful slides and nowadays, practically anyone can take excellent movies with the popular-priced 8mm and 16mm cameras.

But no matter what kind of camera you have, you'll get far better and more satisfying results if you take a few minutes to write down the scenes that, when combined, will tell the most interesting story.

Figure out where you think your story should begin and go on from there, step by step. until the last shot where you show the happy couple in their be-ribboned car as they set off on their honeymoon. If ... there was a camera among their wedding presents they can do the honeymoon chapter themselves. They won't want you around!

On the wedding day, be at the church in time to picture the arrival of the groom and of the bridal party. In some churches it is permissible to take pictures during the ceremony, but you'd better make sure before you try it. Then, hurry to the back of the church for a picture as the bride and groom come down the aisle and, again, on the:" church steps. At the reception, be sure to get a picture when the couple cuts the wedding cake.
