JOLLY HEADS OF STATE—Papier-mache heads of President Eisenhower and Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev are fashioned in Viareggio, Italy, for the annual carnival there. The creations will appear aboard a float that is titled "Ease of Tension."

A STOP SIGN—San Francisco's famed "bird cage" traffic lights have been taken down as too old-fashioned. These are stored in a warehouse before being auctioned off to the highest bidder. A few of the traffic signals will be reserved for museums.

FIGHTING IN THE STREETS—Batting disease at the simplest level, sweepers clean the main street of Chandod, in India's Bombay state. A medical officer supervises.

STARECASE—Pat Regan is supposed to be attracting attention to a new aluminum staircase designed to save space for factories. Staircase was exhibited at a New York show.

SHOWING HIS CALF—Katy, a three-day-old calf, gets a piggyback ride on a farm in Dorking, England. Hugh Watt is carrying Katy around to meet other animals.

ALMOST TIME—A U.S. Navy diver, Ken Brown, checks special watch at a deep sea diving school in Washington.

ROAD AGENTS

LITTLE FROGS in the big pond of business are the street vendors of New Orleans. Whether they're organ grinders with monkeys, sidewalk artists, ice cream men, popcorn vendors, balloon sellers, hot dog men, news boys or the hackie with his horse, and buggy—all of them depend on their wits and their talking ability to make a living. Most of them can point to the fact that they don't have much overhead, if any, and they are their own bosses. Still, when they're sick, there isn't anyone who can take over for them.

Organ grinder is one of the oldest types of vendors.

A sidewalk artist operates his studio in Jackson square. His subject is a tourist.

Balloon man depends on kids bothering parents.
