At the conclusion of the program Miss Lois Smith, County Home Economist, discussed the training school choices for the following year.

Development of the all-electric home with electric heating, cooking, clothes drying, water heating, air conditioning and all the other home applications of electricity contribute to a better balanced 12-month system load for municipal electrical utilities. By encouraging volume sales with diversity of use, utilities can attain lower operating costs, and pass the savings on to the customer.

"There's a man in there," said he, "I 'firgit' his name but he tells me he has an immigrant workin' for him, a married man, and when he 'axed' him about his wife, he said 'her' was in England, so I guess you'd better hunt him out, for them that speaks that way all comes from the same place, I reckon."

At the tavern corners above Richmond Hill they accordingly turned off, and after going three with oxen beyond. "That's father," cried the younger boy. and listening again they heard the same voice along with others. The fact was, it was four or five men "logging" with oxen. The boys ran through the intervening bit of brush at headlong speed, and it would be hard to tell who was more surprised, the boys at seeing their father black from head to foot (for an immigrant never can keep the soot off him as a native can) with only his teeth and the whites of his eyes to relieve the picture, or the man at seeing his two English boys suddenly emerge from the woods. Stapleton came near fainting with excitement and sat down to get his breath and collect himself, while the younger boy stood with his lip quivering and tears gather ing in his eyes, for he wanted to rush into his father's arms but dare not for the sootiness. Phil, who came running from the house, got his arms around his brothers and danced about them as in a polka.

"And her's in Toronto." he called out to the boss. "Her has come across the sea and I never knowed it. I must get she up some way."

The boss said the logging would be all done by night, if they worked well, and he'd go to-morrow with the horses to Toronto and bring her up. So that was settled -- Bob went with him and the boys rested. He worked the remainder of that season with the same man, and got such jobs of work as he could through the winter, living in a small log house for which he paid a trifling rent. Just before the snow went off, he moved on a new "lot" in Uxbridge to begin as many others, "a life in the bush". It was hard work, and the way to do the work had to be learned. The boys learned more quickly than he, but he found the advantage of having a base of supplies, so to speak, in the neighbourhood he had left, and when he wanted some seed or a little flour, and a little later a cow and then a yoke of oxen, he was not quite a stranger and was able to get a reasonable credit. It was several years before he could repay the borrowed money to Wheeler. The latter, what with mills and one thing and another. had prospered in this world and made up his mind that if Stapleton paid him, well and good; il not, he would never ask him, not knowing, perhaps, how hard the other, with a large family and no education or business training, was struggling. At last, however, he came to Stouffville and paid Wheeler principal and interest, the latter making it nearly double the or-

Some years before this, two of Mr. Wheeler's sons were passing in a sleigh not far from where Stapleton lived, and turned off their way to make him a visit. He was glad to see them for their father's sake, and told them that although he had nelther beef, pork nor mutton in the house he could give them some meat for dinner.
