

THE CHANGING CAR BUSINESS

WHY COLD WEATHER MAKES CARS HARD TO START

Testing your anti-freeze for strength and your cooling system for leaks is a must in preparing your car for winter. But right next in importance is an ignition tune-up if you want to avoid waiting for the tow truck some morning not long from now.

Low temperature has two effects on automobile ignition: it reduces the energy output of the battery — the spark that kicks the motor into action — down to 40% of its peak output, and it stiffens engine oil so that as much as 2 1/2 times as hard to move, and the battery losing 60% of its power to move it, that cars are hard to start on cold winter mornings.

Our service mechanics will check your battery for its charge rating and clean and tighten terminals. A minor tune-up will look after your plugs and points so that more of the battery's power will go to move the engine. Now is the time to use the new light multiple grade oils. The few cents additional in cost will pay for a lot of tow charges.

The boss was astounded when he got his salesman's expense account. He called the man in and told him, "You spent $30 a day for meals! How did you manage it?"

The budding author sent a poem to an editor and wrote: "Please let me know at once if you can use it, for I have other irons in the fire."

Without hesitation, the salesman shot back, "Simple. By skipping breakfast!"

The editor wrote back: "Remove irons and insert poem."
