How To Break In Your Car?

There was a time when "breaking in" a new car meant not exceeding 30 mph for the first 500 miles. The reason was to avoid generating excessive heat before the small irregularities in piston machining could be worn smooth.

Though not nearly as vital in recent years due to finer machined tolerances on moving parts, proper break-in is still necessary and will pay off in better continuing engine performance.

Hold your speed to 30 mph for the first 15 miles, then speed up briefly to 40 mph and back to 30 mph from time to time during the first 100 miles.

You may then increase the speed range using the same process until you reach about 250 miles. At that point, increase the speed range to 60 mph and up for brief periods, dropping back to lower speeds.

At 500 miles the piston rings should be well "seated" with the high spots on all bearing surfaces worn smooth and the engine accustomed to high temperatures. The most important point is to avoid MAINTAINING high speeds before this time.

It is always advisable to warm up the engine when starting by driving at low SPEEDS rather than letting the engine idle. A long trip at varying speeds is preferable for break-in driving than a number of short trips.

This intelligent care, as well as strictly observing factory recommended oil and lubrication changes will pay dividends in the next 50,000 miles.
