Farmer requires urban outlook

Farmers have to learn to think like city people if they want to get ahead in modern society, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture says in brief to the federal task force on agriculture.

The brief, which was sent to the task force May 1, says city-dwellers have a different attitude toward work and money from those who have grown up on the farm. Farmers who want to succeed will have to adopt this same urban outlook.

The difference, says the brief, is that farmers have traditionally seen work as the most godly activity on earth, and money as the wealth received for their surplus production.

City people see work as a job, to which they have no great commitment. The salary or wages they earn are the source of all the goods and services they consume.

Close friendships with immediate neighbors are replaced by much more selective relationships with people from a much wider area.

Modern communications have brought these values into the rural area, but the poorer farmer "still seeks the agrarian life in an urbanized rural society."

The brief says this poor farmer needs a different kind of program from his more affluent neighbor. His problems are in his adjustment to society, and what he needs are social programs.

Government has relied instead on economic programs growing out of the wartime economy to try to meet these social problems.

"The government has resorted to product subsidies to help farmers who cannot be helped by subsidies, no matter how large." The brief calls for a line with agricultural problems, which would be tackled with agricultural programs, and those with social problems, for which social programs are needed.

It challenges that both provincial and federal governments have avoided this issue. "It's just not wise politically to tell a man his problems aren't what he thinks they are." Individuals and organizations had until May 1 to submit briefs to the task force, which is expected to report to parliament late in the year. The difference between a mistake and an oversight lies in who perpetrates the error.

Maturity is knowing when to speak your mind and when to mind your speech. If you destroy a free market, you create a black market. If you have 10,000 regulations, you destroy all respect for law. — Sir Winston Churchill.
