C.N. rails not snowmobile trails

A railway right-of-way is no place for snowmobiles, warns J. W. Deck, superintendent CN of police.

"Because of the noise, a snowmobile makes and because most drivers wear well-insulated helmets, it is almost impossible to hear an approaching train, even when its whistle is blowing," he says.

Last year, several people were apprehended for operating their snowmobiles on railway property and were subsequently prosecuted. Fines ranged from $5 to $100, depending on the circumstances.

The amended Railway Act clearly stipulates that the practice is illegal. Section 359 states:

"Every person who, without authority therefor from the company, operates a vehicle upon the yard or right-of-way of the company, except where same is laid across or along a highway, is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding $100."

Mr. Deck says CN intends to maintain strict surveillance of its tracks again this year and will continue to apprehend and prosecute snowmobilers who travel across tracks or along its right-of-way.

Despite warnings and a surveillance program last year, at least three people were killed when their snowmobiles were struck by trains. Several more were injured.

This winter, CN will continue its efforts to educate snowmobilers, and the company is distributing safety posters to the news media, police departments, and snowmobile groups across the country.

Members of CN police also visit interested community groups, as part of the program to inform people about current laws which prohibit driving a snowmobile on railway property, and of the dangers involved.
