portraits to weddings, both black and white, and color. While portrait work is his specialty (he enjoys doing that best), he leans toward candid photography, particularly in weddings. "Stereotype work is on the way out," he says, "natural pictures are what the young people like best". That is why, he points out, even portraits are being done in homes rather than in the Studio.

While George Ross has retained the Cadieux name and is often called 'Ted' or 'Mr. Cadieux' by strangers, he hopes to establish an identity with residents and eventually work his own name into the business. Ted Cadieux established a reputation, a good reputation, and I hope to George Ross is a native of Woodstock. At age 7, he moved to Vivian and joined the 'workaday world' at 14. He spent five years in the Royal Canadian Navy, and was stationed at Halifax. It was while employed with Sinclair Radio, a communications firm, that he was given the opportunity to study photography. He enrolled in a night course at Humber College and attended classes there faithfully, twice a week for five years. Instruction covered all areas, from industrial, through commercial and from George speaks highly of his predecessor. "He's treated me like a son. I couldn't ask more from anyone."

"I figured it was now or never," recalled George, in thinking back to his initial contact with Ted Cadieux concerning the planned purchase. "I heard he (Ted) was thinking about selling, so I decided to see him. He was down at the Arena, taking some hockey team pictures. When he was through, we got together and after some discussion, came to a satisfactory arrangement."
