hockey tips by howie meeker

Canadians should have learned at least one thing from our four encounters with Russian and other European hockey teams. Unless there is a drastic change in our approach to the game, we're not going to be No. 1 much longer. Canada invented ice hockey and I suppose it's understandable that we thought our professionals were the best in the world.

European teams have enjoyed tremendous success against our best since the first series in 1972. A bunch of comparative newcomers have shown us, among other things, that you don't pass stiff exams without doing a lot of homework. And that, dear hockey player and fan is what this series is all about: homework.

Going back to hockey's primary school (to which most of us never went) and learning the ABCs, the three Rs or whatever else you call basic training. Because it's something I never had. Oh, I learned enough about hockey to spend eight years playing in the NHL, and several more coaching professional teams.

But it was not until after my professional career, when I started working with children that I discovered the real guts of the game, why many kids' skates are junk, why a hockey stick can be a kid's biggest handicap, why no youngster can be a good skater without learning balance.

I had to learn by observation, the simple mechanics of developing power in a skating stride. I tried to figure out why a kid stops thinking when he starts moving. Only then did I realize that most Canadian boys never had a hope of reaching the NHL, because of the haphazard way they broke into the game.

So I began the meticulous inspection of the boys' skates, sticks, and protective equipment and over the years devised drills for teaching the basic skills. I wanted to create a learning experience that would be of value to all young hockey players, whether they had big league ambitions or not.
