Hodgson discusses disclosure bill

By William Hodgson, M.P., York North

About two weeks ago, I stressed the various attitudes between the Official Opposition and your Ontario Government on the balanced need to require companies to file pertinent information under the Corporations Information Act.

The essential difference consisted of less paper work for small business on the government's part and more paper work for small business as advocated by the NDP. The two different positions reflected I think, the basic party philosophies on small business and even on the role of government today.

Despite the basically different outlook, your Ontario Government does not regard the business community as pure as the driven snow. Like people, some businesses practise bad customer relations, provide minimal or non-existent service and fail in their responsibility to check out the integrity of other individuals in signing sub-contracts to perform a vital service. Possibly, just enough to warrant registration of these companies or to be brought under the New Homes Warranty Act.

What results from these questionable practices is that such companies hurt the public image of their own industry and business as a whole. When it comes right down to it, the heart of the matter is personal responsibility on the part of business and fulfillment of trust to the customer.

During the budget debate last week, Frank Drea, Parliamentary Assistant to Consumer and Commercial Relations Minister, Sydney Handleman, related the problems of some of his Scarborough Centre constituents in dealings with the prefabricated cottage erection industry. These people paid up to $17,000 to erect a summer cottage and to purchase the land on which this building would sit.

In the case of one couple, they followed all the advice of the professionals and still ended up with neither lot, structure or enjoyment of their vacation property. The difficulties encountered by this couple range from the appearances of criminal fraud by the subcontractor who would repeat this 'con job' on other unsuspecting people and companies who fail to check him out thoroughly.

The real difference in the prefab industry is that the consumer must put all of his/her money up front before the materials are delivered to the site. In conventional construction, the consumer advances funds for different stages of the project.
