Radio amateurs emergency test

A massive snowstorm struck the Toronto area on the afternoon of January 28, paralyzing traffic, creating a breakdown in law-enforcement leading to looting situations, and stranding hundreds of motorists on Highway 401, in danger of freezing to death as the storm roared unabated through the afternoon.
 As it became obvious that civic authorities were going to require assistance in handling a wide variety of communications problems, the local Amateur Radio Emergency Service swung into action.
 Being a Saturday, a large number of ham mobiles were on the road, stranded along with many others. These operators collected names and addresses of motorists wishing to advise families of their predicament, and kept the local police advised on traffic conditions.
 Amateur radio stations were set up at Red Cross headquarters, the local office of the Ontario Hospital Association, local Borough utility offices, and at least one Metro radio station. Liaison was established with the police radio system.
 The preceding situations represent the format for the annual Simulated Emergency Test, to be held on the afternoon of Saturday, January 28, by local-area radio amateurs.
 Sponsored by the American Radio Relay League, this Test is an annual event designed to tackle the many problems that exist in any disaster situation, and examine methods of eliminating them, while training radio amateurs in the art of disaster communications.
 Amateur radio has a long tradition of rendering assistance in time of emergency, and it is only through constant training that the amateurs are able to field a large, experienced group of communicators when the need arises. This Test serves that purpose.
 The Test is coordinated in the local area by Michael Goldstein, helped by his assistants Paul Edgley, Lyle Stanway, Salsus Jones, Keith Ballinger, and over a hundred radio amateurs.
 If you have a suitable receiver, you can listen to the activities between 146 and 148 megahertz, locally.
