The steam era recalled

By ED SCHROETER
UXBRIDGE — "You know, the steam age was really wonderful," reflected Francis Hockley, of Sandford. Mr. Hockley and his 1922 George White steam engine was one of the many exhibits that rekindled memories of bygone days at seventh annual "heritage festival," at the Uxbridge-Scott Museum.

About three thousand people attended the two day event, organized by the Uxbridge-Scott Historical Society.

"We've been getting bigger every year," explained Isobel St. John, president of the organization. She called it an event "for the whole family," including displays of candle-making, spinning, kite-making, and dancing performed by Indian children from the Ottawa Valley.

The affair began, she explained, to give their organization a reason for being. They're collecting items to preserve the past for people, she said, "so we bring them out and demonstrate them."

Bill Woods, chairman of the Steam Show, was raised in the steam era. "I was twelve years old when I fired my first engine," he recalled.

According to Mr. Woods, these machines played "an important part in our history" from about 1860 to the 1930's, when the gas tractor was introduced. He noted it requires specialized knowledge to operate these antiques, or explosions can result.

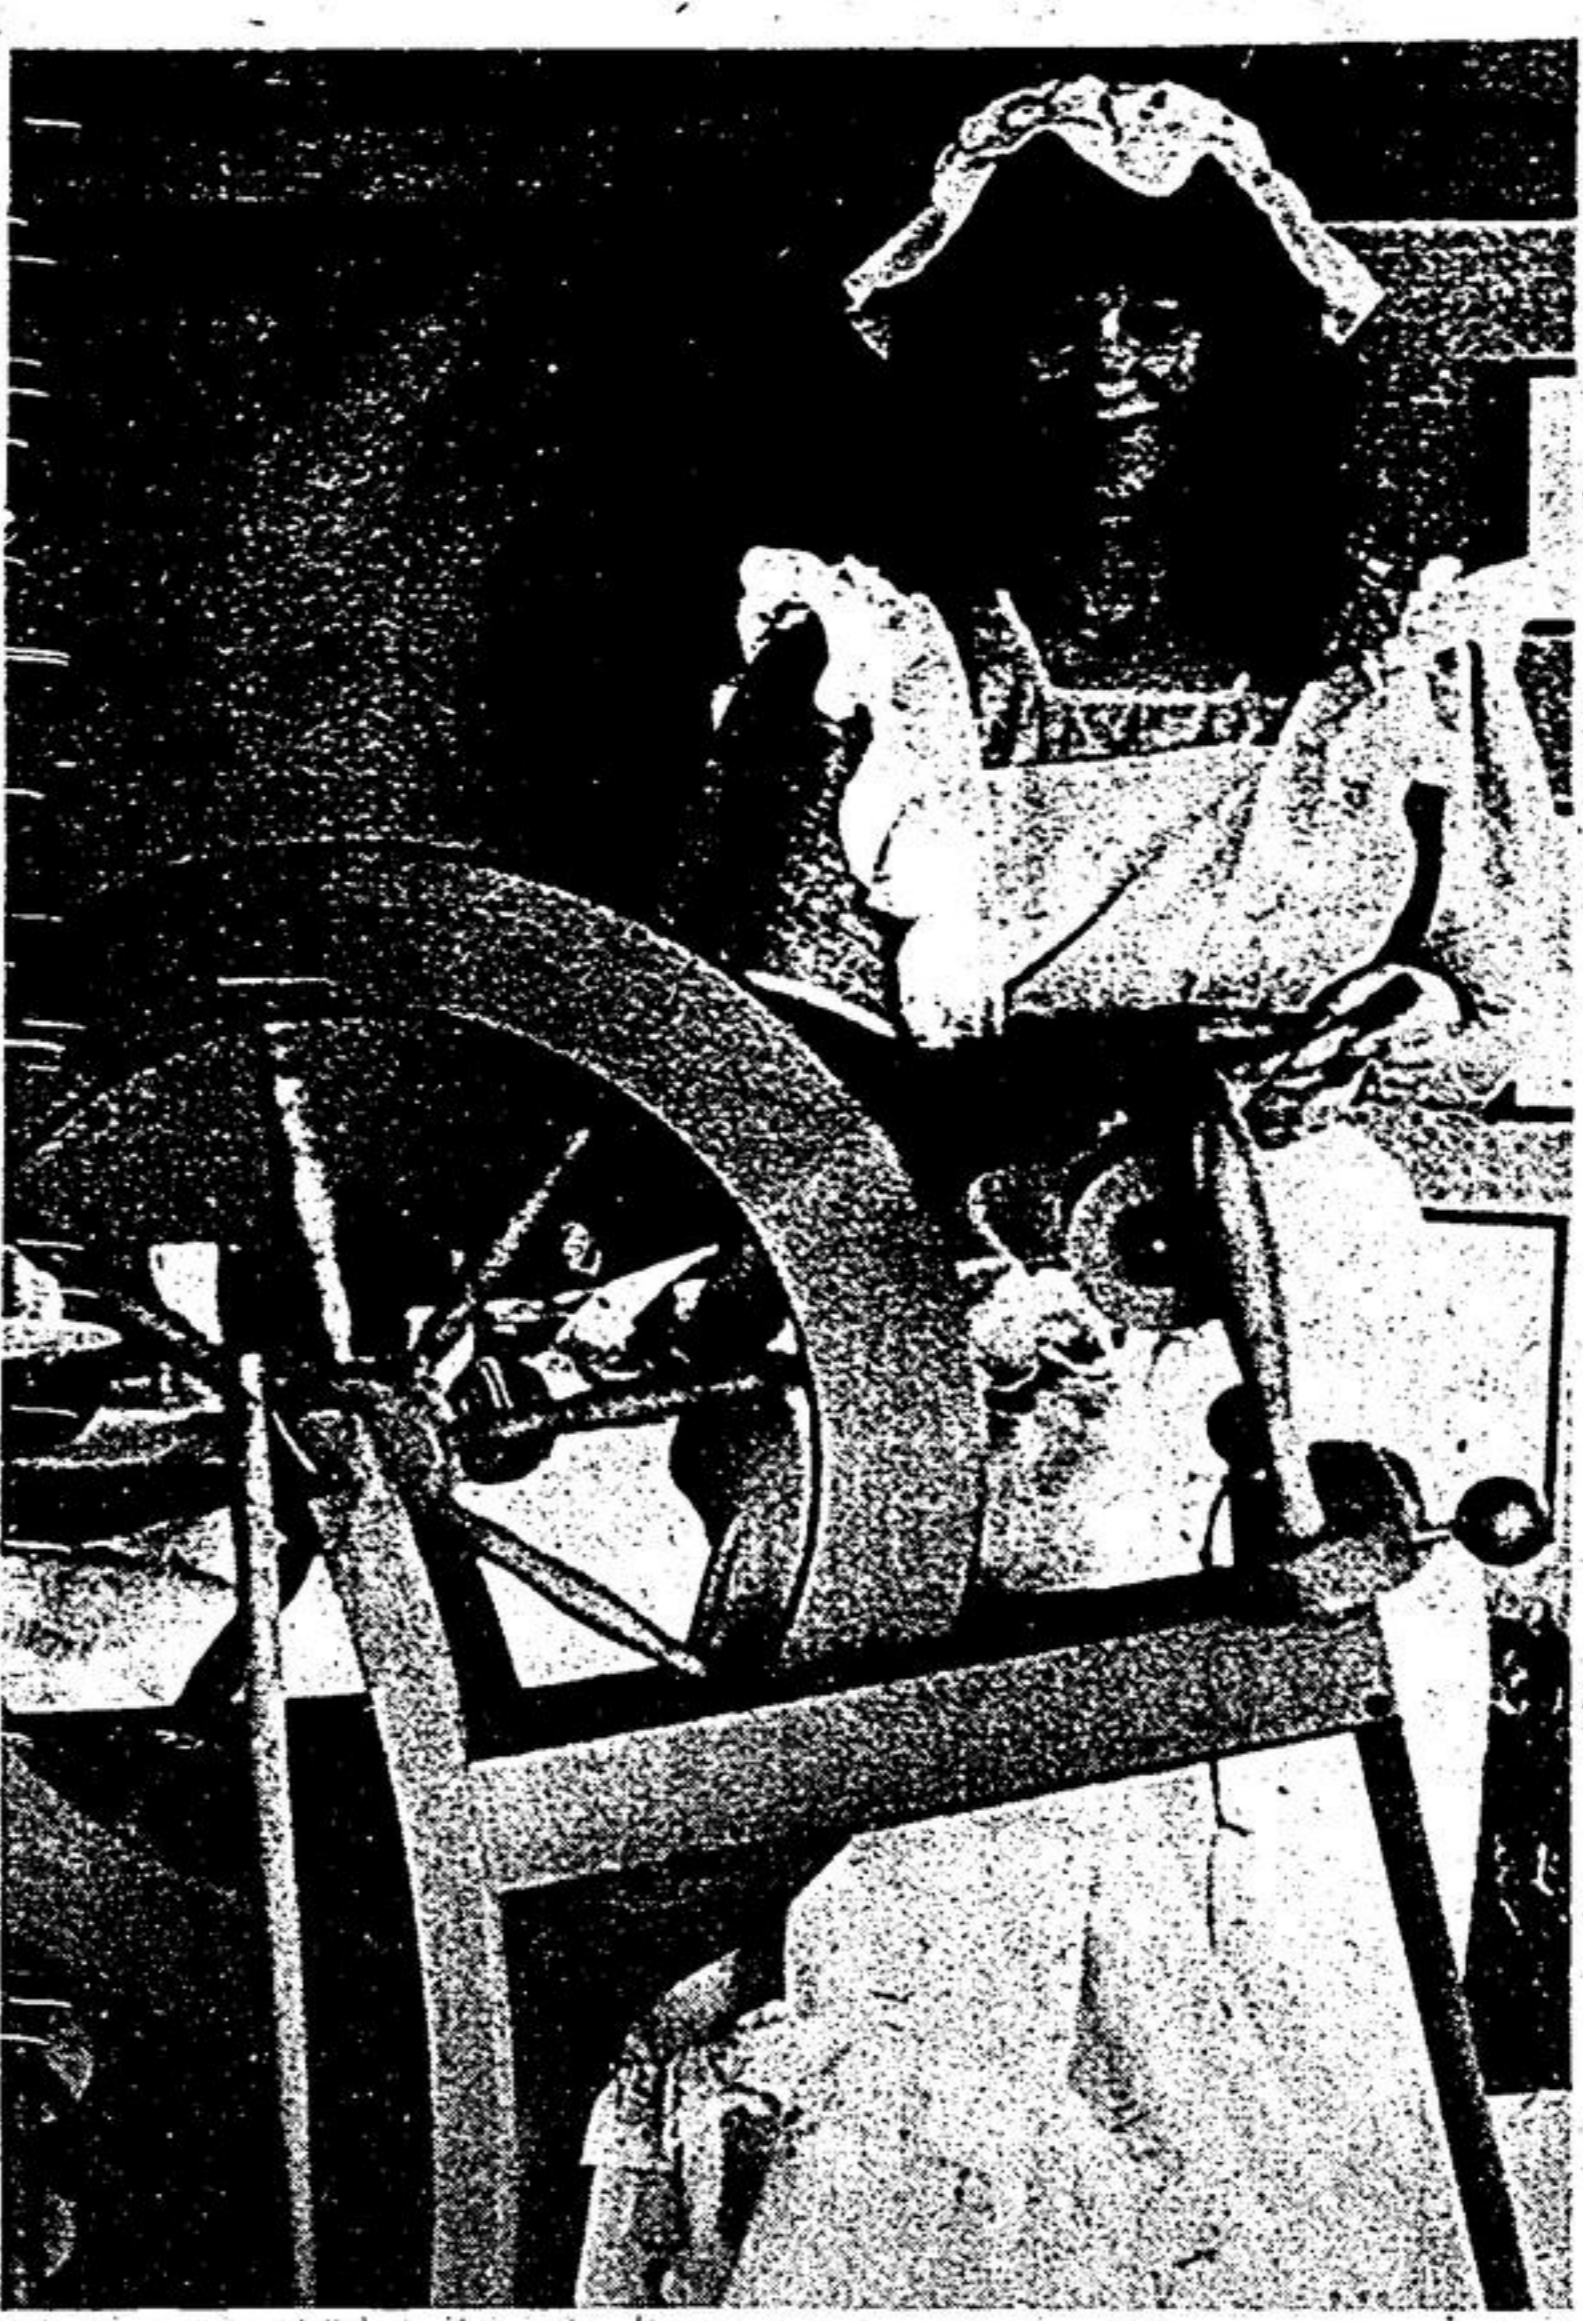

Mr. Hockley noted that gasoline-powered tractors made their appearance in the area about 1910, but were still considered less reliable than the steam-driven "contraptions" as late as 1920.

He said they were great, requiring only a little water, and wood, to get them going. The only problem, he said, it took an hour for the fire to build up sufficient heat to drive the machine.

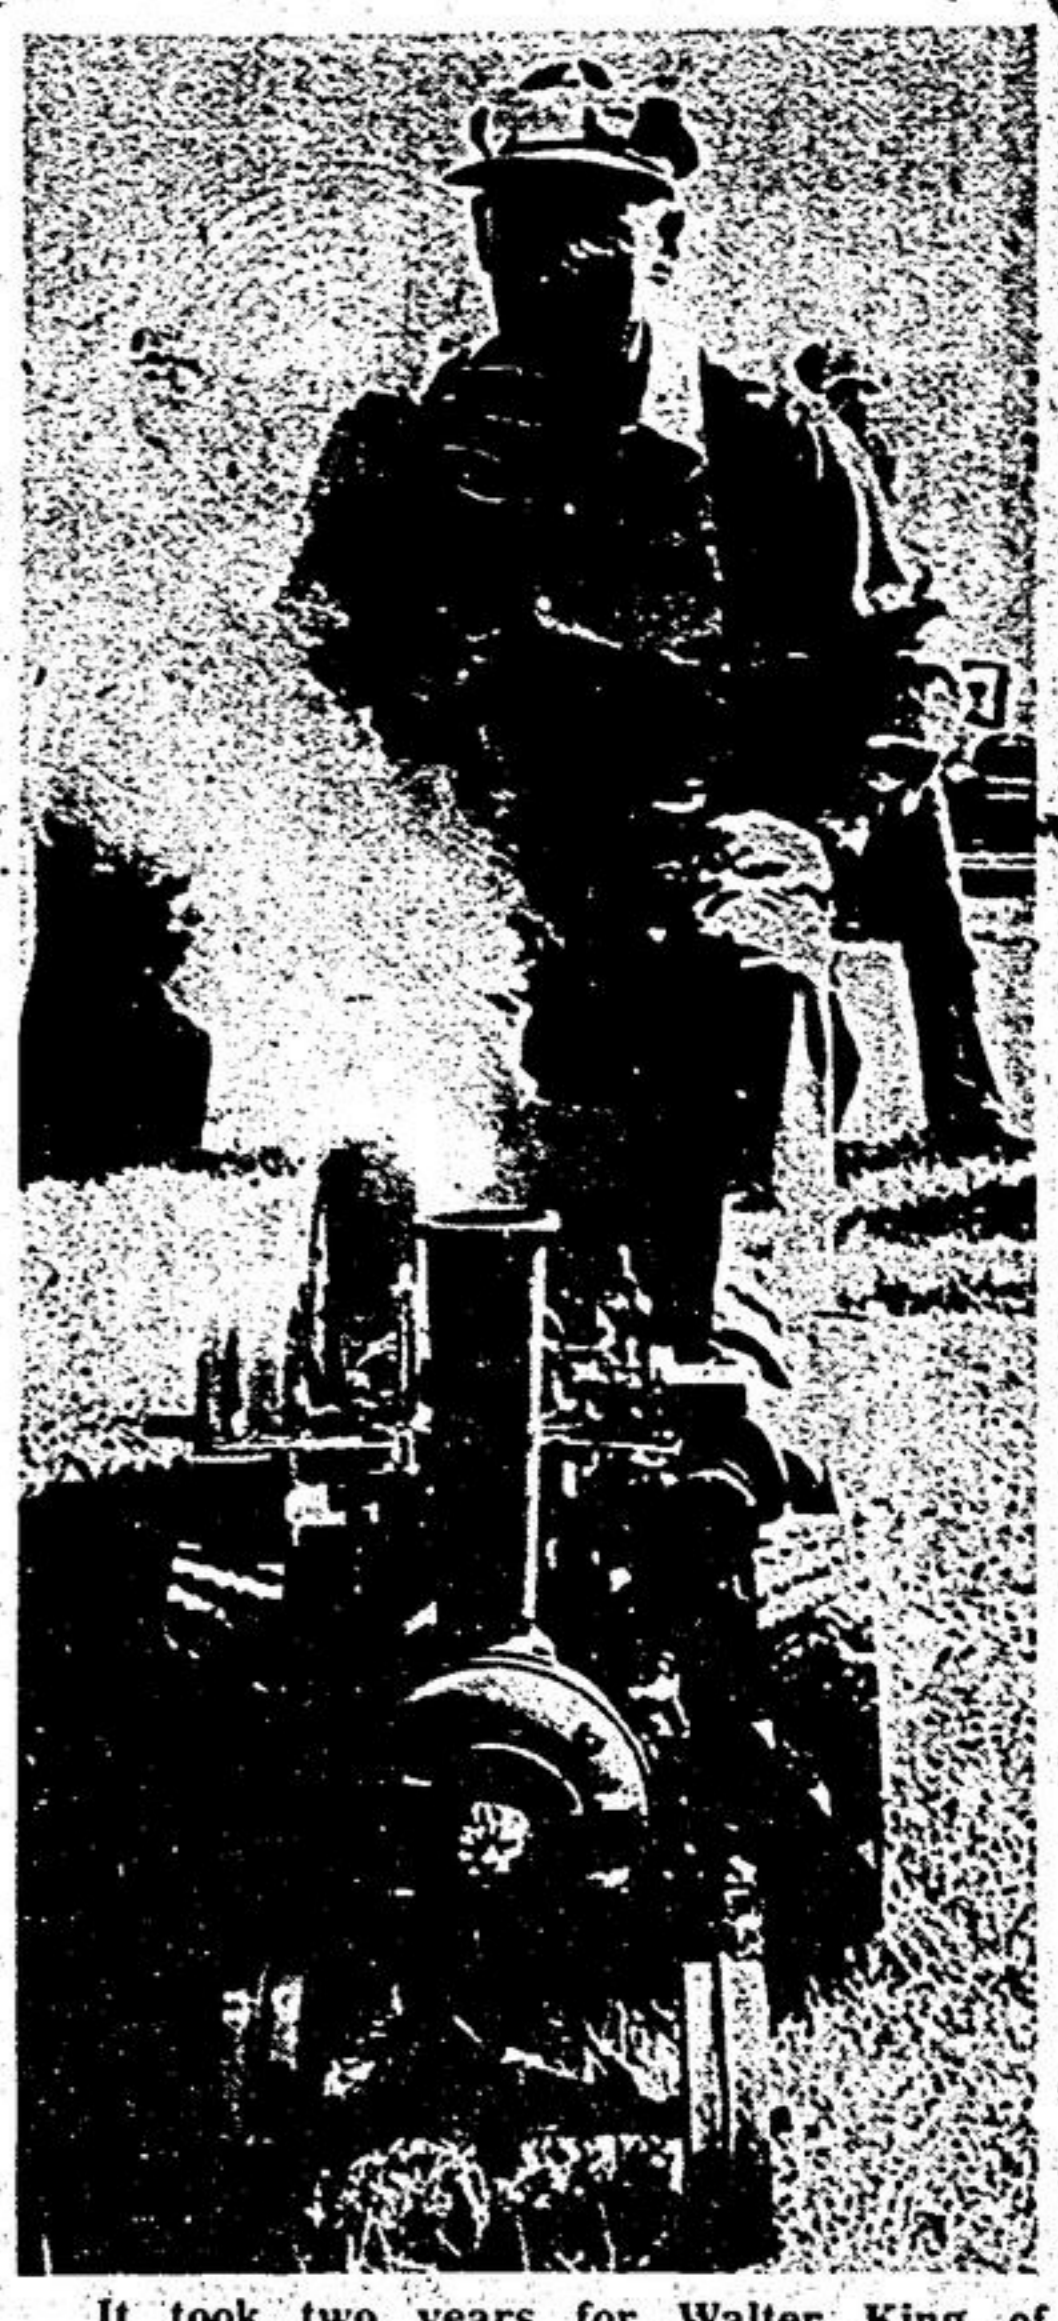

Walter King, from Seagrave, made his living threshing, during a time unfamiliar with fossil fuels.

He operated his own business from 1935 to 1944, when the wood-burning workhorses were slowly, but inevitably replaced.

By 1944, there wasn't a steam driven machine on the road, he concluded.

Sheila Maloney of Zephyr, demonstrated the art of spinning at "Steam Threshing Days", Aug. 26 and 27 at the Uxbridge-Scott Museum. Sheila's been attending the event since the festival was started. —Ed Schroeter

It took two years for Walter King of Seagrave to build this scaled-down replica of a Waterloo steam engine; and it really works. —Ed Schroeter
