Editor's Mail Truckers respect the law

Dear Sir: I read with interest an article published in your paper headed "Dump Truck Driver - Idiots."

There are always a few "bad apples" in every barrel, but on the whole most dump truck drivers are reliable, intelligent, conscientious men.

These drivers police themselves and do not hesitate to tell one and other if they see something that is not safe driving etc. As for the speeds quoted in the article, these trucks do not travel at 80 miles per hour and I am sure that the noise they make with the metal boxes and chains rattling make them seem to be travelling at a much higher speed than they actually are.

The one class which seemed to be singled out was the independent owner operator. In order to become an owner operator these men often finance everything they own and are always aware that no matter how much insurance they carry, one accident can completely wipe out everything they own and possibly their own lives.

Before a person is given a driver's licence they should be required to go for a ride in any heavy truck and I am sure that it would make them much more aware of the problems truck drivers experience and would make them think twice before they pulled out in front of a truck, cut a truck off or complained about the way the truck was being driven.

The overhead, the monetary profits, the long hours, the laws and the public's attitude make a person wonder why these men stay in the business as long as they do.

The next time you drive down a highway remember every load of gravel and every load of asphalt needed to build that road was hauled there by a dump truck and when you sit in your home remember that every load of sand and stone required to build that home was brought there by a dump truck.

Until such time as a substitute for gravel in construction and road building is discovered the construction industry could not function without these trucks and the people who own or operate them.
Yours truly,
R.R.
