Theatre group revives play for new theatre

As their contribution to the opening week of the new Markham Theatre for Performing Arts, Markham Little Theatre will revive their March '84 production, Waiting for the Parade.

The original cast and virtually the same production staff are working on it.

This production has a small cast, simple set, and was extremely well received when it was first presented. This made it the logical choice for a single performance.

At the '84 spring festival, the MLT production of Waiting for the Parade won two awards and was nominated for six others. The first award was for best production of a Canadian play and the second was the special adjudicator's awards for best ensemble acting and best set design.

Reviving this special production for the opening of the new theatre is proving to be great fun for the director Liz Wyatt, producer Eric Newton and for the many MLT members who are involved.

On Oct. 26 at 8 p.m. audiences from the past as well as theatre goers who are new to Markham are invited to share the lives of five women who endure the tragedy of war with humor and comradeship.
