Libraries going on line

Markham Public Libraries entered the computer age this week. Launched Tuesday night by Citizenship and Culture Minister Lily Munro, the York Public Libraries Network is expected to save York libraries over $746,000 in the next five years. The $662,000 system links regional libraries to provide a computerized circulation system. Markham, Aurora, Newmarket, Vaughan and Richmond Hill are included in the network. Funding was provided by the Ministry with a $415,000 grant through the province's Library Co-operative Automation program. Markham's Chief Librarian Judith Hare is deli-ighted with the automated system and said the central database will provide speedier access to library materials anywhere in the region. The system will also reduce material duplication while individual library terminals will allow access to listings catalogued in various municipalities. Ms. Munro referred to the "libraries are more than just books," 1986 motto of Ontario libraries in unveiling the system and commended York Region on its work in implementing it. "The investment of Ontario taxpayers' money in our libraries will come back many, many times over," she said.
