

"Marriage: hard work"

By ED MEADE

Markham Family Life Centre
 Marriage is not a big deal. It's relationship that really counts. How many times have we heard that a good relationship went sour when the two people tied the marriage knot?

Marriage is really nothing more than saying out loud for all to hear "we love each other and just, maybe, our love will result in the birth of a human being." True, many of us want to say this out loud in the context of a religious ceremony: that God is recognized in the expression of love.

Many want to simply express it in terms of human love. It comes down to the same thing. We love each other, we want to live together, and we want the legal and civil protection and rights that our community offers us.

No big deal. But working on that relationship is a big deal. We must work to maintain our independence through our love.

We must work to communicate honestly, openly without blaming and with full responsibility. This is not easy. All of us struggle at it from time to time.

But the fight is worth it because soon that independent, loving, sexy self becomes so much part of us that we do it naturally. No big deal because we have made a mistake, just trust, acceptance and picking ourselves up again.

Marriage is a personal choice. Society used to demand it of us. This is changing. But let's face it. It has tremendous rewards. People who work at their marriage will readily acclaim: "It is not easy, but worth every minute of it!"
