Green 'N Growing Bringing nature indoors

By ELAINE GORDON
Flowering plants bring nature indoors with colors that breathe of spring. They warm interiors, and hearts, with their living vitality and beautiful blooms.

The fascinating Amaryllis is at the top of my list of gift plants. It's a honey. My sister, Gayle, gave me a couple of bulbs last year and about two months after planting, these sleeping beauties woke up to display huge, trumpet-shaped flowers. The spectacular blooms will last longer in a cool room and out of direct sun.

When flowering is through, make sure lots of light is provided, feed monthly and give the plant a summer holiday outdoors. In the early autumn, bring indoors and gradually reduce watering. Store dry in a dark, cool spot for a few months before bringing back to life by starting the cycle over again.

The Poinsettia, harbinger of Christmas, prefers very bright light and watering when soil surface is dry to the touch. It doesn't like drafts. The showy bracts (they surround the actual insignificant yellow flower in the centre) will last longer if the plant is kept in a room that's not overheated.

This native of Mexico looks festive whether in a hanging basket (this effect can lower a high-ceilinged room) or on a table. Massing several of these bright and bold plants on a raised platform in a wicket basket, for example, not only gives a striking display, but the grouping lets them share each other's humidity, too. A specimen size is shown advantageously when placed in a low position such as on the floor.

The Christmas Cactus is not a desert cactus so the soil shouldn't be allowed to totally dry out. It likes a bright, airy room with evenly moist soil and is quite happy in rooms that we are comfortable in. Insects rarely bother this one.

It does have a disappointing habit though...if the direction of light is changed, even a quarter-turn of the container...buds may well be lost. The Wax Plant (Hoya) will drop buds for the same reason, too.

The splashes of color from drooping flowers at the tips of pendulous stems are set off splendidly in a hanging basket, especially in a mature plant.
