Dave Gregory, a former recreation consultant with CNIB is new district administrator for CNIB.

New CNIB head works one-to-one

By BRUCE ETHERIDGE
The new district administrator for the Canadian National Institute for the Blind won't be trapped behind his desk shuffling papers. Dave Gregory, a recreation consultant with the CNIB for the past 12 years, has replaced Bill Brown as district administrator for the York-Durham region. The administrator's office is headquartered in Markham. Despite his promotion — which includes the responsibility of raising $275,000 for the local chapter for 1987 — Mr. Gregory said the position's "not going to be strictly an administrative job with me." He still plans to continue working with visually impaired people on a one-to-one basis "a good part of the time."

Mr. Gregory works primarily with people who have just registered with the CNIB. He is often the first CNIB representative people who have just lost their sight hear from — not always an enviable task. Mr. Gregory goes to the person's home to outline the services that are available through the CNIB and helps determine an individual's specific needs.

His duties also include setting up self-help groups to re-train people who have lost their sight for jobs, sports and hobbies. The CNIB operates over 40 of these workshops that includes such activities as skiing, bowling, curling and sculpting.

There are 482 visually impaired people in York region. The CNIB's services now include people who are not considered legally blind but are visually impaired.

Mr. Gregory began his career at the CNIB in Markham as a recreational leadership student on a year's placement. His father managed a community centre in Scarborough and Mr. Gregory "just naturally gravitated towards recreational leadership as a career."

The 33-year-old father of two said he's found it "very gratifying to see the type of community support the CNIB has received in the York-Durham region. The staff has been very welcoming of me as well," Mr. Gregory said.
