

Cry of the loon rare in cottage country

The haunting cry of a loon echoing over a still lake evokes such a sense of wilderness in Ontario's cottage country. But human activity poses an increasing threat to loon populations, as it does to many other wildlife species. Now, evidence is beginning to mount that loons are under siege from yet another danger: acid rain. Wildlife biologists theorize that, as lakes become increasingly acidic, they become less and less able to support a variety of aquatic life, from micro-organisms to fish, which make up the food chain on which loons depend. As lakes slowly die from acid rain, they may also lose their capacity to support loons. A major cooperative effort, the Ontario Lakes Loon Survey, has been mounted to count, study and save Ontario's loons. Through the survey, and under the guidance of experts, hundreds of volunteers are checking lakes across Ontario for loons and nesting success. The project was developed with financial support from the Long Point Bird Observatory, the Canadian Wildlife Service, the Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources and the World Wildlife Fund. Anyone can participate in the survey; no experience or special experience is necessary. Volunteers simply contact the Long Point Bird Observatory, and are given the information they need to collect data about loons. Cottagers in particular are enthusiastic participants in the program. They are frequently concerned about saving loons, and are more than willing to do a loon count on their local lake. In this way, wildlife biologists can obtain a much broader range of information than they would be able to gather if they had to rely on the efforts of a few field researchers to do a bird count, said Jane McCracken, coordinator of the survey.
