SUSAN GROBER

Marjorie Davison won't be hitting the streets with other canvassers for the Heart And Stroke Foundation blitz this Valentine's Day — fellow residents of Thomson Court apartments will come to her.

"I collect right from my apartment for the entire month," she says. "We put a notice in the lounge and they just come to me."

The 69-year-old has collected for the foundation for five years. And although she has been a heart patient since her husband died in 1975, Davison still stays active in the community.

"I just got home on the first of December after spending nearly six weeks in hospital, so I should know how important it is to help the foundation," she says.

Davison was rushed to Centenary Hospital after she suddenly began to suffer chest spasms and shortness of breath while playing bridge with her friends last October.

"My nitroglycerin wasn't doing me any good and that meant it was serious," she says.

Once in hospital, Davison's medication was changed and her doctor suggested she try an angiogram. This fairly new device enters the body near the hip and is used to see the heart and the coronary arteries to find any blockage.

Her doctor warned that she wouldn't be allowed to move for eight hours after the procedure because she could hemorrhage, but Davison was ready for it anyway.

Davison says technology for treating heart patients has improved a lot over the past 10 years, and that's why she helps collect for the Heart And Stroke Foundation.

"It gives me a nice feeling to help out," she says. "Whatever they do next may not be in time for me, but they might come out with some 'super-drug' for the younger ones. They sure have come a long way since I've had it."

Although she was scared on her trip to the hospital, Davison says she doesn't waste time worrying about her heart.

"I don't sit and dwell on it," she says. "I figure if it's going to happen, it's going to happen."

"I can't do lifting, shovelling, reaching or climbing stairs, but I still manage to get around," she adds. "I still drive, I play bridge twice a week and I do light housework."

Davison also says she just loves to see the Toronto Blue Jays baseball team play in the summer. But out of all different sports, Davison prefers to watch her grandsons' play hockey.

"That's actually how I got into helping the heart fund," she says. "A lady at one of the hockey games asked if I would collect and I said yes. Since then I've come a long way as far as helping people."

Residents at the Thomson Court apartments are quite willing to contribute because many of them also have heart problems, says Davison.

"Some people in this building live strictly on their pension cheques, so they can't afford to give," says Davison. "But many of them will contribute a little bit of money because that's all they can afford."

"It's kind of nice that they even care that much."
