Trip to Haiti an eye-opener

By BRUCE STAPLEY

For 17-year-old Tricia Lowe, her first trip outside North America was an experience that opened her eyes to third world deprivation, while at the same time opening her up to future opportunities to serve others abroad.

The Grade 11 Uxbridge High School student who lives with her family on the 20th Side Line recently returned from a two-week 'missions work experience' in Haiti.

She was the only girl in a group of eight people from Springvale Baptist Church who went down to help build a new church in the Haitian town of Marbial.

The project was part of the overall program conducted by Immanuel International, the Stouffville-based missions organization, an effort aimed at helping counter the ravaging affects of poverty and political unrest on the island.

"My father asked me to go," says Tricia, referring to Robert Lowe, one of the organizers of the trip along with Martyn Hartley and Richard McGowan. "At first, I thought 'I am the only girl, where am I going to stay?' But it worked out fine."

The group was accommodated in a four-room house inhabited by an elderly man and his grandson.

"I ended up in the same room with the men in the group," Tricia says. "I would have been too afraid to stay in a room by myself."
