rently involved, he says it doesn't bother him. "I get kidded a lot, but I don't take any of it seriously. I know they're only joking."

He does hope other boys will realize that the clubs offer a wide variety of interesting topics and that some of them will consider joining a project group in the future.

The project sometimes involve field trips, and David has attended the annual luncheon at the Royal York Hotel, sponsored by the Kiwanis, which recognizes the work of 4-H clubs.

"In August I was invited to a 4-H conference at the CNE for the weekend. Both town and rural clubs came; there were about 200 of us altogether."

They took part in a skill-a-thon, covering areas such as first-aid and how to cope in different emergencies. They also learned something about judging livestock from the rural group.

Through his involvement, David has made many new friends. He doesn't go into every club, he notes, just those he's interested in.

"I'm hoping to continue," he says. "I've done as many as three clubs in a year, it just depends on what's being offered." He describes 4-h as a youth club, where skills can be acquired or improved on.

Both his sisters and his older brother have been involved in projects, and he and his younger sister, Catherine, have joined the same clubs.

The club has no membership dues and you don't need special qualifications to take part in a project. "If we need anything, we usually get donations," David states. 4-h is open to young people up to the age of 21 in both urban and rural areas.

When David leaves Stouffville District Secondary School, he's hoping to go to the Royal Military College in Kingston to train as a mechanical engineer in the army, and he's currently enrolled in the army cadets. He also enjoys sports.

"I play hockey with the high school Friday mornings. I've tried out for the volleyball and basketball teams, but I haven't been successful yet."

In the meantime, the Grade 11 student has got his hands full with 4-H, cadets, sports and that unpopular pastime, homework. He doesn't have time to wonder what to do next.
