'The Party's Over' rings a happy note

One of the nicest things about going to other people's parties rather than hosting your own, is that you can leave when you've had enough.

Giving a party for adults is a piece of cake, however, compared with the minefield of potential disaster awaiting the parent who tries to stage, manage a child's party.

Last weekend, my daughter celebrated her ninth birthday, an event she had been planning since last July.

For the first time, she announced she'd like the party away from home.

My sense of relief was tempered by the difficulty of scaling down the lofty expectations of a member of the '80s material generation.

No, we weren't taking a limo to the Mad Hatter, The Science Centre or Canada's Wonderland, I insisted firmly. Neither could she hope to take a classful of friends downtown to see Cats.

The option of going to a show

KATE'S CORNER

Kate Gilderale

The upheaval created by his nocturnal ramblings woke me up, and at 1:36 a.m., when the noise level had increased, I abandoned all pretense of charm and snarled that if they didn't go to sleep right now, tomorrow's party was cancelled.

At around 7 a.m., the birthday girl, unable to contain herself any longer, tiptoed deafeningly into the parental suite. Muttering "happy birthday, darling," between clenched teeth, I unheeded her presents from their hiding place while sending my dazed husband to fetch a large mug of tea.

By the time we set off for the farm, everything was looking good; the sun was shining, the children had only spent 10 minutes arguing about who should sit next to whom, and for the next two hours, someone else would be taking the heat.

Just one thing puzzled me as I sat exhausted on the patio; why is "The Party's Over" set to such a plaintive, mournful tune?
