Stouffville's Margaret Wilcox stands in front of her rig with her three children, Shane, Stephen and Everett. She's been driving a dump truck for more than two years and finds few barriers to her in the business. Her co-workers, all of whom are men, are friendly and helpful, she says, admitting that she does take some ribbing.

do enjoy it, because it's never really slow, she notes, and she hasn't been called out as much

Work this summer has been really slow, she notes, and she hasn't been called out as much as she'd like. "It all depends on the construction industry." During the building of Skydome, Margaret did regular deliveries to the site. "That was a lot of fun. I took my camera down with me and got some pictures while it was being built."

Her three sons — Shane, 13, Stephen, 12, and Everett, six — are very supportive, she says. "They think my job is great. Shane helps me out a lot. I come home and the roast is in the oven with vegetables around it; he's done it all. He's just super."

On the days she's called out, she has to be up and away by 5:30 a.m. "They start loading in our gravel pits at six o'clock and we finish between five and seven in the evening."

She's never regretted her decision to become a truck driver. "I've met a lot of people, mostly men, and they've all been incredibly helpful," concludes Margaret. "I really get a charge out of what I do; it's a lot of fun."

Farmer's market in Stouffville?

Stouffville's Business Improvement Area (BIA) seeks interested participants in the area to launch a farmer's market.

If enough interest in the plan is generated, the market will be held each Saturday in the downtown core, according to BIA officials.

Farmers and those interested in crafts are invited to participate in the weekly event.
