Name game a tough one

Have you ever noticed how people you know in a specific context — working at a local store or dropping their children off at dance class, for instance — are impossible to place the minute you see them in a different setting?

They may look vaguely familiar, but you can't think of why and you're never sure whether to say hello or pretend you haven't noticed them because whichever option you choose, they'll do the opposite.

I'll never forget a party I once went to. I was deep in conversation with a charming and friendly woman, who suddenly said, "You don't know who I am, do you?"

I had to admit that while her face was awfully familiar, I couldn't think of where we'd met. It turned out she worked at the doctor's office, which for parents of small children is the place to hang out, but since she'd neglected to wear her white coat on this occasion, I simply couldn't place her.

For sheer social torture, however, it's hard to beat my husband's office parties. I'm forever being introduced to people with the dreaded words "have you two met?"

My "no" and their "yes" are usually uttered simultaneously. It's no excuse that the first time we saw each other was in a disco, where the dimness of the lights and the ear-bending wall of sound rendered me deaf and blind.

Anyway, they usually look completely different a year later, their-once rainbow-streaked hair now a nifty crewcut, their leather and chains replaced by a cashmere suit and Armani shoes.

It's all right for them, because I've hardly changed at all. In fact, I'm probably wearing the same "designer" ensemble I picked up at last year's January sale.

Once I get to know someone well enough, though, I never forget the name, which is a lot more than I can say for my old man.

He's so hopeless that he often gets me and my daughter mixed up. Whenever we meet someone he knows and I don't, he'll say airily "This is my wife, Kate," and then duck out to get a drink.

By the time he returns, I've managed to obtain not only the person's name but also a spotted history of his life.

All this pales in comparison with the time I flew back to the old country for a bit of loving kindness from my mother. When I emerged battered and tired from the seven-hour flight, I spied her waiting for me in the crowd and started waving frantically.

Admittedly, I'd just had my hair permed and had made the mistake of putting a rinse on it as well, so instead of the usual straight reddish-brown tresses, I was sporting a blue-black Afro, but it still gave me a jolt when my own mother look straight through me.

Maybe it's because bonding wasn't invented when I was born, or maybe she was just too embarrassed to claim me as her own.

When it comes down to it, perhaps we're all a bit like the person who said, "I'm no good at faces, it's names I remember."
