Reader finds column 'appalling'

Dear Editor,

It was with shock and anger that I read the article entitled 'French-English debate divides Canada' and wish to comment on a number of the statements.

First of all, the number of unilingual Canadians is thankfully becoming smaller all the time with millions of immigrants, native peoples, Inuit, etc. who all speak two or more languages.

Further, school children in at least eastern Canada all take English and French.

When have you or these other unilingual Canadians been forced to speak and understand French outside of school?

Or is this a negative attitude from school days due to low grades or negative parents? I have never been forced to speak French in the business world unless I chose to deal with a Francophone of my choice.

Also, I am appalled at your lack of knowledge of Canada. You state French is spoken regionally in Quebec, totally ignoring northern Ontario (try driving Hwy. 11 from North Bay onwards), the northern half of New Brunswick (a legal bilingual province), eastern Cape Breton Island, southern Manitoba, and pockets to the west.

You offend the Acadians, Metis, and northern Ontario peoples by labelling French as Quebec.

Should Quebec be given special status? I think so, as anyone who has ever travelled to that province immediately notices the distinct society (a great attraction for our U.S. neighbors, by the way).

Most Francophones have lived in Canada 300 to 350 years; they are not new immigrants demanding special status but were here centuries before English was ever heard north of the 13 Colonies.

The comment about a person in Moose Jaw learning French was also poorly thought out. The only way to stop dividing Canada is for both Anglophones and Francophones (not Quebecois) to learn and appreciate each other's languages.

Ignorance has always been the root of hatred, bigotry and intolerance and I'm afraid to say this article reflects much of these traits.

Why is 'Je me souviens' a negative message? Perhaps you were also offended by the previous licence plate 'La belle province.' You should read some of the slogans of U.S. plates!

The danger of French disappearing was evident in the late '50s and early '60s in Quebec (and other French-speaking areas) when few billboards or advertising signs were ever in French.

In Quebec the small and wealthy English population literally controlled finances, management, corporate affairs, etc. I know from personal experience the Montreal Canadiens were forbidden to speak French while travelling even though the majority of them were Francophones.

The CBC just this past week did a news documentary on the disappearance of French from some areas of Manitoba. Yes, the danger is there.

Finally, to form such negative attitudes because of once having experienced prejudice while ordering food in Quebec, and another time while trying to obtain directions is ludicrous and immature.

Have you never dealt with a surly waiter or waitress in Toronto, Moose Jaw, Vancouver or St. John's? And try asking people in New York, Chicago, or Calgary for directions. There are good and bad in all cities and they speak many languages. Don't try to pin surliness or rudeness on just Francophones.

Yours truly,
P.D. Browne,
