

Charges in Bloomington crash

A 53-year-old Scarborough man narrowly escaped serious injury last Thursday morning after being struck by a gravel truck at Bloomington Sideroad and the 9th Line in Stouffville. Emergency crews closed the busy intersection for nearly two hours after the 6:10 a.m. crash on Oct. 29. Local firefighters spent more than an hour prying a man free from the metal confines of his vehicle with the jaws of life. According to York Regional Police, a van was heading westbound on Bloomington when a gravel truck, turning northbound on the 9th, struck him. The Willowdale gravel truck driver was charged with making an improper left turn.

Province blamed for York's lagging waste initiatives

York Region barely has its feet wet when it comes to diverting trash from landfill sites.

Compared to many communities in the U.S., York's recycling, composting and hazardous waste facilities appear inadequate and incomplete.

And the province is partly to blame for the region's slow start, said several dignitaries Thursday at a waste management forum in King Township.

More than 80 regional leaders gathered to hear how waste management companies operate across the border and around the world.

Progressive Conservative environment critic Don Cousens said the provincial government has a knack for snubbing many waste management options which prevents Ontario from increasing its programs.

"Ontario is dealing with ignorance ... where (the government) opposes options without knowing what is done successfully elsewhere," Cousens said.

Stouffville resident Dave Probert said it's "disgusting how (environment Minister) Ruth Grier is turning her back on alternatives."

Probert said Ontario can't possibly be successful in waste diversion if Grier "continues to be so arrogant to the whole process."

York chairman Eldred King said the region still needs the province's approval before it can co-ordinate waste management efforts to a larger scale operation.

"We have no legal authority as of yet (to operate waste facilities,) but we're asking for it," King said.

King said before Grier took over the environment ministry, the region had "reasonably good education" regarding waste management options and had worked hard to develop a solid corporate interest within the region.

York is looking now to incorporate a "total" facility which would handle all waste diversion methods on one large site, King said.

"This would be the better way," he added.

York presently has several facilities scattered throughout the region where only limited materials can be recycled or composted.

The group heard from one New York-based company which annually recycles and diverts about 30,000 tonnes of kitchen and yard waste in one totally-enclosed indoor facility. The fully-automated operation, which stretches across four acres of land, takes in food, leaves, sawdust and corrugated cardboard to the tune of 105 tonnes a day.

Cousens said Ontario needs to learn about as many options as possible.

"We need to investigate ways that would take us further ahead than anyone else - no one option succeeds in getting us there," Cousens said.

York's chief administrative officer Bob Forhan said York's future waste management initiatives depend heavily on the IWA's dump site selection expected this month.

"No matter what happens it's all paid for by the taxpayers," Forhan said.

Green money cans help fight dumps

The Mayor's Task Force against dumps in Whitchurch-Stouffville is looking for donations as you shop throughout the community.

Mayor Fran Sainsbury said the force has distributed more than 100 money cans across the community to be stationed in local businesses.

The cans are decorated in the same green Whitchurch-Stouffville Protects - No dumps Here! logo as on the lawn signs. Any donations received will help fund the town's fight against the Interim Waste Authority to prove that Whitchurch-Stouffville lands are not suitable for a 600-acre dump.

Sainsbury said she is keeping her fingers crossed that the community will not be on the IWA's short list expected to be released this month.

She said, however, that if the town has to initiate a battle, donations will help keep the costs down.

"The more we do by volunteerism, the less we do by taxes," Sainsbury said.
