Teens' worries are varied

JONI BRUNTON
SDSS Correspondent

I was sitting around worrying about what to write about for this week, when a thought hit me: I wondered what everyone else was worrying about. We're supposed to be the next generation, right? So what do we as a generation think about changing when we inherit the earth? I got a lot of different answers. One of my friend's first reaction was "my hair." She then proceeded to say, "No, don't put that in!" Well, why not? That happened to be the first thing on her mind at that moment. Everyone thinks that you must think of something serious, like world peace, which she consequently came up with. Thing is, we don't think about the environment or nuclear war or human rights. At least, not always. Come on here people, we're kids. I wonder when it became such a crime to be honest with yourself. Society and the media have pushed issues in our lives so much that we start to feel guilty when we just don't care all the time, but the truth is, we don't. Now don't get me wrong, I got a lot of serious answers too. One guy's first reaction was "money," another's who I didn't even know was religious was his religion. The future came up a lot too. Most of my friends are in Grade 12 or O.A.C. or have just graduated. Many of them aren't sure what they want out of life and are asking "what now?" So what are we worried about? That was summed up by one girl I asked. "Joni," she said, laughing, "I worry about everything!"
