cut down on recreation costs that can't be recovered.

She said it isn't fair to compare Stouffville's fee with other bigger communities who have a much larger tax base to draw on, but agreed the price should come down. McKee Wetheral said she is currently "negotiating with user groups" and is working on a presentation to council which will re-allocate ice time and free up more for family use.

"Please give me a chance. We're trying real hard to be fair to everyone and we're getting there," McKee Wetheral said.

The town's "user pay scenario" has affected all groups using the town's ice allocations and "everyone is conscious of that," she said. "These prices are indicative of the way it was at the town pool this year - it's the new user pay scenario," she added.

McKee Wetheral said she will present a report to politicians next month and hopes to get more time for pleasure skating to "offer residents a better value" for their money. Until then, however, council can likely expect a barrage of complaints opposing the fee.
