 traditional aspect to it in one form or other. Not necessarily heavy sauces, as the foods have lightened up in the past few years. There are now lighter flavours and sauces, and more types of lettuces on the market that are being used, for instance.

Not surprisingly, Broadbent, who worked in restaurants in Markham, Toronto, and Stratford, Ontario before finally opening his own establishment, is himself an avid gourmand. He tries to eat the same type of food that he prepares for his own patrons whenever possible, but is fussy when it comes to eating in other restaurants.

"I like dining out, but most times, I end up wishing I hadn't gone. There are some places, however, that charge a lot of money, that you can always count on."

While Broadbent has managed to maintain his own culinary principles through the past few years in his own restaurant, he said he's looking for things to open up now that an economic recovery is being forecast.

"It's much easier to be creative when people are in a mood to sample your wares, he suggested.

"Having survived a tough economic time, I'm optimistic. The better the economy, the more I can use my imagination. But when all you hear is talk about budgeting every day, it makes it more difficult to do the things I like to do."
