

OPP reports 17 per cent drop in traffic deaths

Fatal motor vehicle collision statistics from the Traffic and Marine Branch of the Ontario Provincial Police suggest that traffic fatalities are on the decrease in Ontario.

In 1994, the Ontario Provincial Police investigated 537 fatal motor vehicle collisions which resulted in the deaths of 634 people.

This translates into a 17 per cent drop (170) in fatal motor vehicle collisions from 644 in 1993.

Statistics also show that during the same time frame, fewer people were killed on Ontario roads as traffic deaths plummeted 15 per cent (113) from 747 in 1993.

Figures for 1994 also reveal an 18 per cent reduction in fatal collisions and a 17 per cent decrease in people killed in comparison to average statistics for the past five years.

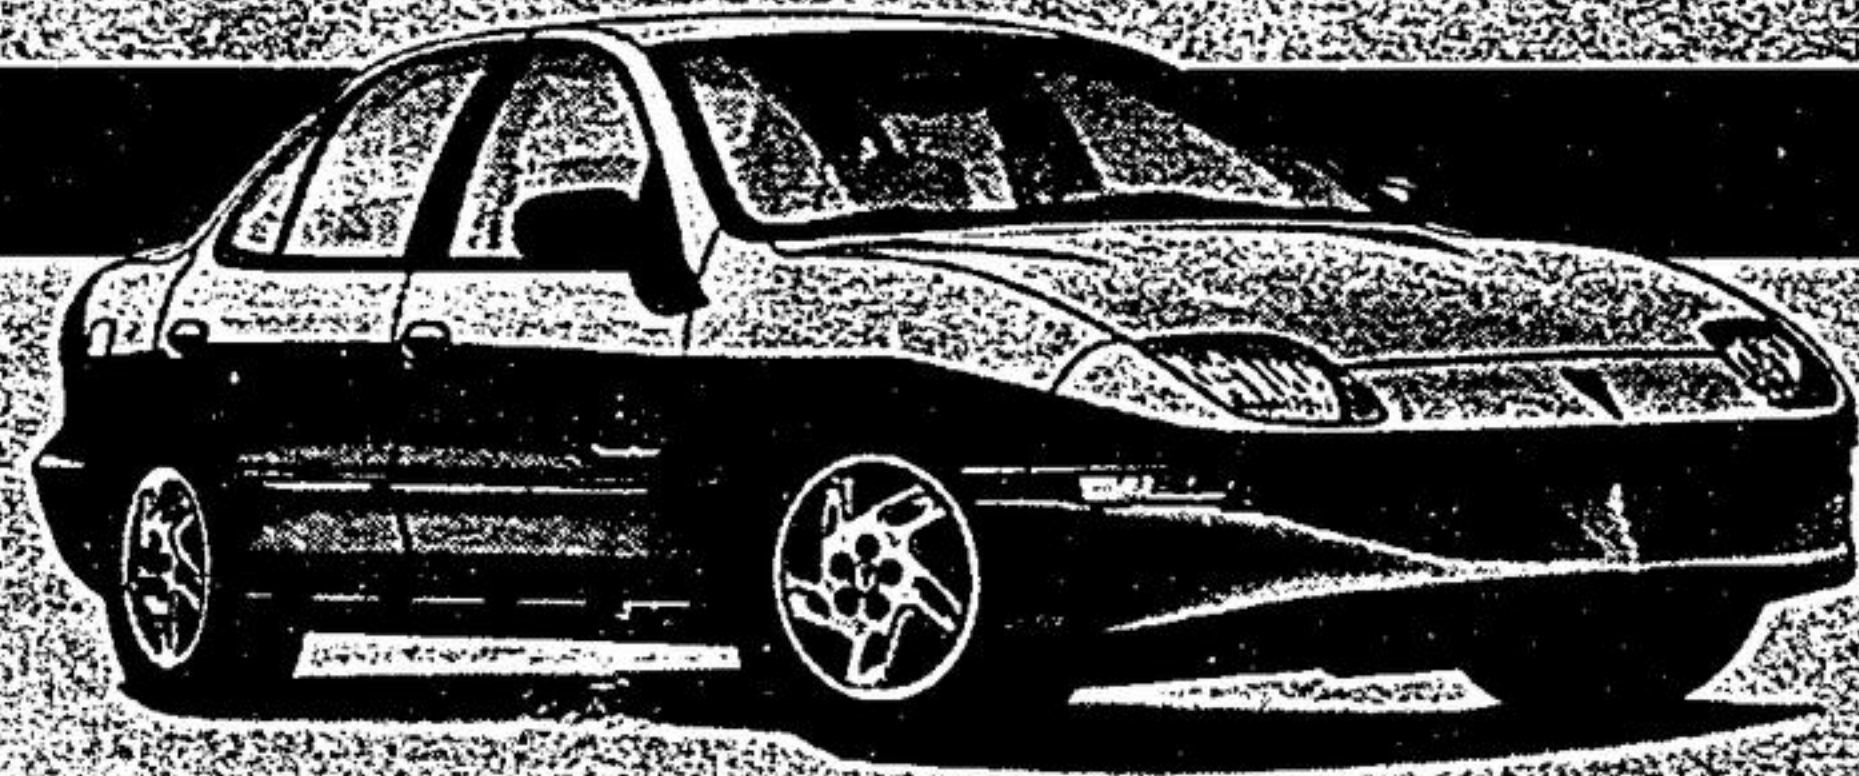

Advances in vehicle safety features such as day-time running lights, side impact beams, air bags, and an increase in seat belt compliance are among the reasons believed to have significantly contributed to this trend.

In addition, the recent enactment of the Graduated Drivers' Licensing system and the continued use of photo radar in Ontario have increased public awareness of traffic safety issues.
