Dairy farmers lost supply management with GATT treaty: Reader

like to keep it that way.

If it becomes legal in Canada, the farmer will have to decide if the extra milk would offset costs of more feed, quota, hormone injection, along with the extra stress put on the cow.

Personally, I don't think it does.

Sadly, supply management was lost when the GATT deal was signed in December 1993.

In the not too distant future, we are going to have to be more competitive as the States want our marketplace.

The deciding factor is that milk production is big business, not as simplistic as the consumer or editor thinks.

If we have to compete with the United States, I would hope that Canadian farmers can use good management choices for effective survival of our industry.
