 no longer welcome at the day care, she read an ad in The Tribune for the day care centre. "I don't understand why the day care advertises in the local paper and, at the same time, tell me they don't have room for Peter."

Keogh said the ad runs on a regular basis. "I guess the ad has been too successful," she said. Reters is asking the provincial government to explain why her child has been denied day care. Also, she takes issue with how it was handled. "Why is Peter being forced to make another adjustment? He didn't do anything wrong. Somebody made a mistake. Yet, it's the children and the parents who are being asked to pay for the mistake. I want an answer. I am not satisfied with this. I am not at all pleased with how it was carried out," said Reters.

Decoy carver takes on world champs

 ing decoys for eight years. He has competed for two years. His redhead drake was first in the intermediate category at the Canadian National Carving Competition at the Sportsman Show in Toronto earlier this year.

world level carvers out there who do just two carvings a year. Shropshire isn't the only one in the family with the decoy carving bug. His six-year-old son Jesse is already following in dad's footsteps and is looking to compete in the children's category.

While his drake fetched $400 before the world finals, Shropshire said the value goes up like other rare art works for world championship level decoy carvings. "They are starting to show up in art galleries. Once you win at the highest level, they go up in price. There are

His daughter Katie, 10, roughs out her father's leftover blocks and then paints them. Wife Wendy is an encouragement as well. "They all think it's great, they're very supportive. My wife is my cheering section."
