

Young voter concerned about education, jobs

The Tribune is following the federal election through the eyes of four local groups of people who look to the government on varied issues. Today we introduce you to John Lambersky, a teenager who will be voting for the first time in this election. He represents the concerns of youth in this election. Also being profiled for their opinions are the Hulsofs, a farm family; the Rogers, a senior couple, and the Hargraves, a working couple.

On June 2, John Lambersky of Stouffville will experience a milestone -- he'll become a first-time voter in the brand new riding of Oak Ridges.

Since the Stouffville District Secondary School student recently marked his 18th birthday, he's especially keen on the election campaign.

If we lived in a perfect world, Oak Ridges candidates and the party leaders would have ability, a sense of equality, charisma and courage, he said.

Lambersky is, however, a little sad about the relationship between today's political parties and the young voter.

"There's a great deal of cynicism from my peers," he said.

"There have been enough unfulfilled campaign promises recently to last a life time. But, I don't think that their outward complacency is going to last all that long. You can't hide your head in the sand forever."

Since the Grade 12 student has his sights set on university, how the local candidates treat education is noted.

While Lambersky would prefer to avoid major tuition hikes, he's not upset about the cost of learning. "Post secondary education is still accessible to Canadians wealthy or otherwise," he said.

Indeed, Canada deserves a strong leader, Lambersky insisted. "I would like to see a leader who has a worldwide vision, including a sense of where Canada belongs globally. If we don't continue to be competitive in a global way, we may lose our high standard of living."

When it comes to morality, Lambersky holds a very strong position.

"It's too simple to say honesty or morality is a good judge of a leader. I would rather have a prime minister who is an adulterer than a puritan with limited abilities." While employment rates high on Lambersky's list, he doesn't advocate job creation programs.

"I prefer to have a government that provides a healthier economy, rather than job creation projects," he said.

Overall, Lambersky is optimistic about Canada's future.

"We're on the verge of tackling our deficit, our economy is picking up and the job market is looking positive for the future. I think (Finance Minister) Paul Martin is right. We need to start thinking of very long term goals. A quick fix or massive spending on jobs won't help over a 25-year term"

As the five-week campaign continues, Lambersky is still undecided as to which party he will vote for.

"But, I have all but narrowed the choices down to the Conservatives or the Liberals. I don't see any reason to vote Reform or NDP. They are too volatile to have as a national government," he said.
