

Call 9-1-1 only in emergency situations

You can call 9-1-1 for emergencies, life-threatening situations, or crimes in progress. You can call 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. If you call from a pay phone, the call is free - you do not need a quarter.

When you call 9-1-1, your call is answered by a calltaker who will say "emergency" and tell you the time of your call.

Your call is immediately processed through our advanced computer system which is equipped with an Automatic Number Identifier (ANI) and an Automatic Location Identifier (ALI).

This means that when the calltaker says the word "emergency", the computer screen will display the telephone number and address you are calling from.

The ANI and ALI systems save many lives, since some people who call 9-1-1 are unable to speak because they collapse or someone grabs the phone and hangs up.

In these situations, help will still be sent to the address, even though the person could not speak to the 9-1-1 calltaker.

Once the calltaker answers your call by saying "emergency", you will be asked questions to determine the assistance you need.

Your information may go out to the fire department, ambulance, police service or all three departments.

You will be asked for confirmation of your address and phone number.

Try to remain calm and explain your situation clearly.

If you cannot speak English, 9-1-1 Emergency Services can get an interpreter for over 140 languages.

Remember to call 9-1-1 for emergency situations only.

For incidents which are not emergencies call 881-1221 for York Regional Police. For non-emergencies in Durham Region, call the police at 1-888-579-1520.
