

On target

Spinal research benefits from tourney

■ From page 1 ■

Jennifer Smith, one of the event's organizers. Since 1984 the Canadian Spinal Research Organization (CSRO) has conducted research into a cure for spinal injuries. The organization also helps people cope with spinal injuries and educates the public in preventing spinal injuries.

Spinal injury is one of the most devastating types of injury as the spinal cord is the communications link between the brain and the body. When injured, signals don't get through, resulting in paralysis.

According to CSRO, about 30,000 Canadians have spinal cord injuries. The average age of injured victims is 19 years old.

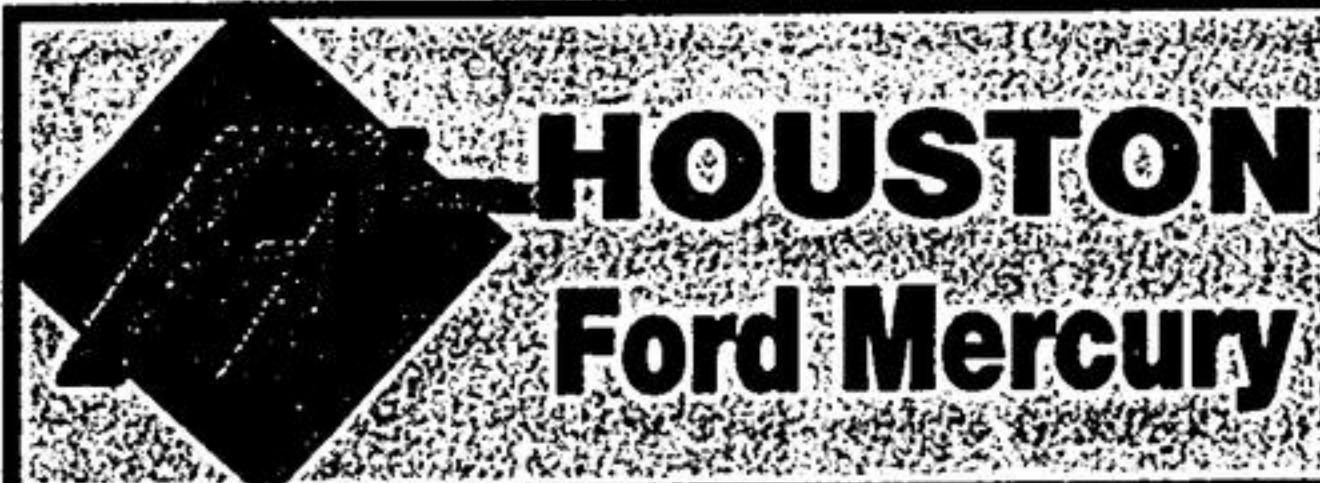

Despite the seriousness of the cause, participants in the golf tournament will have a lot of fun. "We're having a sports auction, a raffle, a putting contest and a hole-in-one contest," said Smith. "You can win a car, even if you don't get a hole-in-one — whoever gets the closest."

The winner of the hole-in-one contest will walk away with a brand new Lexus car. There are other prizes, donated from various sponsors, including Canada Trust, Scotia McLeod and the Lone Star Cafe.

So far, 100 people have signed up for the tournament — about 144 are anticipated by the time golfers tee off.

The cost is $175 for registering four golfers for the game and other competitions, plus lunch and dinner. Other events coming up to support CSRO include a car rally on Oct. 25 and a cosmic bowling tournament.
