

Social event helps chronically-sick kids

KATE GILDERDALE
Correspondent

The Jennifer Ashleigh Foundation, which was established in 1990 to provide financial help for people with chronically sick children, is currently helping about 30 families a month.

It's a formidable undertaking, but one which has proved immensely worthwhile, said foundation coordinator Jane Sleep, who is in the process of organizing the second annual Jennifer Ashleigh Country Barbecue this month for the families and volunteers involved.

"We had a letter from a little girl last year after the picnic, saying it was nice to go to an event where people didn't stare at her and where she fit right in."

The youngster's comments have been echoed by many parents who have been faced with the double burden of emotional pain and financial hardship when their children become seriously ill.

"Words cannot possibly express the elation and overwhelming wave of relief when you so generously assisted us," wrote one family. "The stress, concerns (and) worries are at times quite overwhelming, so to receive your assistance not only provided us (with) real help — that
