Bill 136 'unfair'

Have worries about the Tory government's new labour bill? Think again, says Linda Torney.

Even a professional who lives in York Region won't escape the bad effects of Bill 136, the president of Metro Toronto and York Region's labour council warned in an interview. But labour and community groups brought another argument against the provincial legislation to a day of "people's hearings" in the region. It isn't fair, they said.

"It is anti-democratic, and I think Canadians care about democracy," Torney said during a break in the presentations heard inside a Thornhill strip mall Tuesday.

The bill would create two groups to deal with public sector workers — a temporary "transition commission" with the power to impose first contracts, and a "dispute resolution commission" either side could turn to for a binding decision in talks.

The government has said the transition commission will get involved only when public sector workplaces are involved in an amalgamation or merger; the dispute commission only to settle contracts in fire, police and hospital sectors. A similar bill affecting schools is expected soon, however.

Unlike the Ontario Labour Relations Board they would replace, members of these commissions will be appointed by the government's inner circle, so they would have a political bias, unions and their supporters insisted Tuesday.

Bill 136 is "one-sided interference" designed to prepare the way for a lower-waged, privatized public service, argued Tony Mitchell, representing a group of union retirees.

If that happens, York Region residents may see changes for the worse in their schools, hospitals and municipal services, but aren't likely to save on their taxes, Torney suggested.

"You just may end up paying more money with less control," she said.
