

Women must take responsibility for inequality, too: Reader

LETTERS

Dear Editor,

It is tiresome to hear and read constantly that women are not being treated equally in the social, political and economic realms.

By whom are they not being treated equally?

The majority of the population is female.

Could it be themselves who are being unfair to their sisters?

Women outlive their men by seven years, hence not surprisingly own most of the country corporate equity, the bulk of which is controlled by pension schemes and RRSP mutual funds. If women don't like the way they are treated in business, should they not turn up for the shareholders meetings?

It is universally recognized that the very early years of upbringing have infinitely more influence on beliefs, attitudes and behaviour than anything learned after puberty. Who has virtually exclusive care of the young males and females during these tender formative years?

The problems which women seek a convenient scapegoat instead of sharing responsibility. The problems which women perceive, and which may be real, will remain, so long as they Tony Roulledge
