

Don't move fish in the aquarium

through your filter.

If you're doing a long move, then set your tank up as if it was a new tank — including a week-long delay before putting fish in the tank.

Initially, put in a few hardy fish to get the nitrate cycle established.

Moving the fish

Where do you put them? Two basic options: a friend's tank or a pet store.

Some pet stores will, for a fee, board fish during a move. A signed contract detailing what responsibilities the pet store is assuming is a very good idea.

How do you pack them?

For short periods of time, you can put the fish in sealed bags, half-filled with air. This time can be stretched somewhat by filling with oxygen rather than air. Put the bags in a padded, compartmentalized container and ship by air.

For larger fish or longer trips, one can use a sealed bucket for each fish.

How do you support them on a move? Fish basically won't eat during the move. Fish can survive a week or so without food if they've been previously well fed.

Try to maintain an even temperature, perhaps by placing the fish in a sealed cooler or compartmentalized cooler.

For long trips, particularly by car, a battery-powered air pump and airstone is a good idea (if not a must).
