

Kavluk strong at Boston Marathon

Kim Kavluk was set to have a great day at the Boston Marathon as the weather was in his favour.

Kim found the cool morning wait chilling and spent shivering and shaking while he waited.

He guessed that this took away some of his energy reserves for later.

His training was complete as he now crowded the start line with the internationals from all around the world. Canada was listed on the television during the afternoon coverage.

Stouffville had two other entries this year. Entered was Chris Bellerby, we are still awaiting his results, his brother John and Kim who was back again to try his luck.

The day was perfect for a good run. In fact, the leaders were on record pace and talk was that all four records could go down.

This was first evident in the men's wheelchair race when the course record as broken by Franz of Switzerland.

John went past Kim on Heart Break hill. Kim said, "the down hills got to me and I was looking forward to the big up of Heart-break."

Kim was struggling to finish, he felt so drained.

Yet he found enough energy to place 824th overall out of the 11,000 plus crowd, still inside the top one per cent.

His finishing time of 2:57:24 was under the magic 3-hour barrier.

If you see him around town he is probably still walking a little strange.

This is because of the muscle fatigue from marathoning.

The worst nightmare for these roadrunners is going down a set of stairs.

The old saying that the mental half way point is mile 20 lets you know that going on all those long runs can pay off.

Also a runner friend once said to me:

"Fred, strange things can happen after mile 20, you enter a different zone."
