Diamond solitaires can be worn any time with anything

The diamond solitaire necklace has become a must-have on the international fashion scene.

And in Canada, the country with the world's highest diamond ownership rates, retailers are scrambling to keep up with demand for the single, simple diamond on a chain.

Today, diamond solitaires represents 22 per cent of our diamond jewellery business and 27 per cent of our stone-set neckwear business," said Jonathan Birks, the vice-chairman of Birks Jewellers.

According to the jewellery industry, it's the renewed interest on the neck that has spurred desire for this classic jewellery item.

"We think it began with the Y-necklace which drew attention to the neck and then the trend was upgraded to include designs with precious stones - and diamonds, in particular," said Kris Kulesza, vice president of Peoples Jewellers.

And with today's fashion focus on simple, elegant lines, this subtle yet stunning accessory has never been more timely.

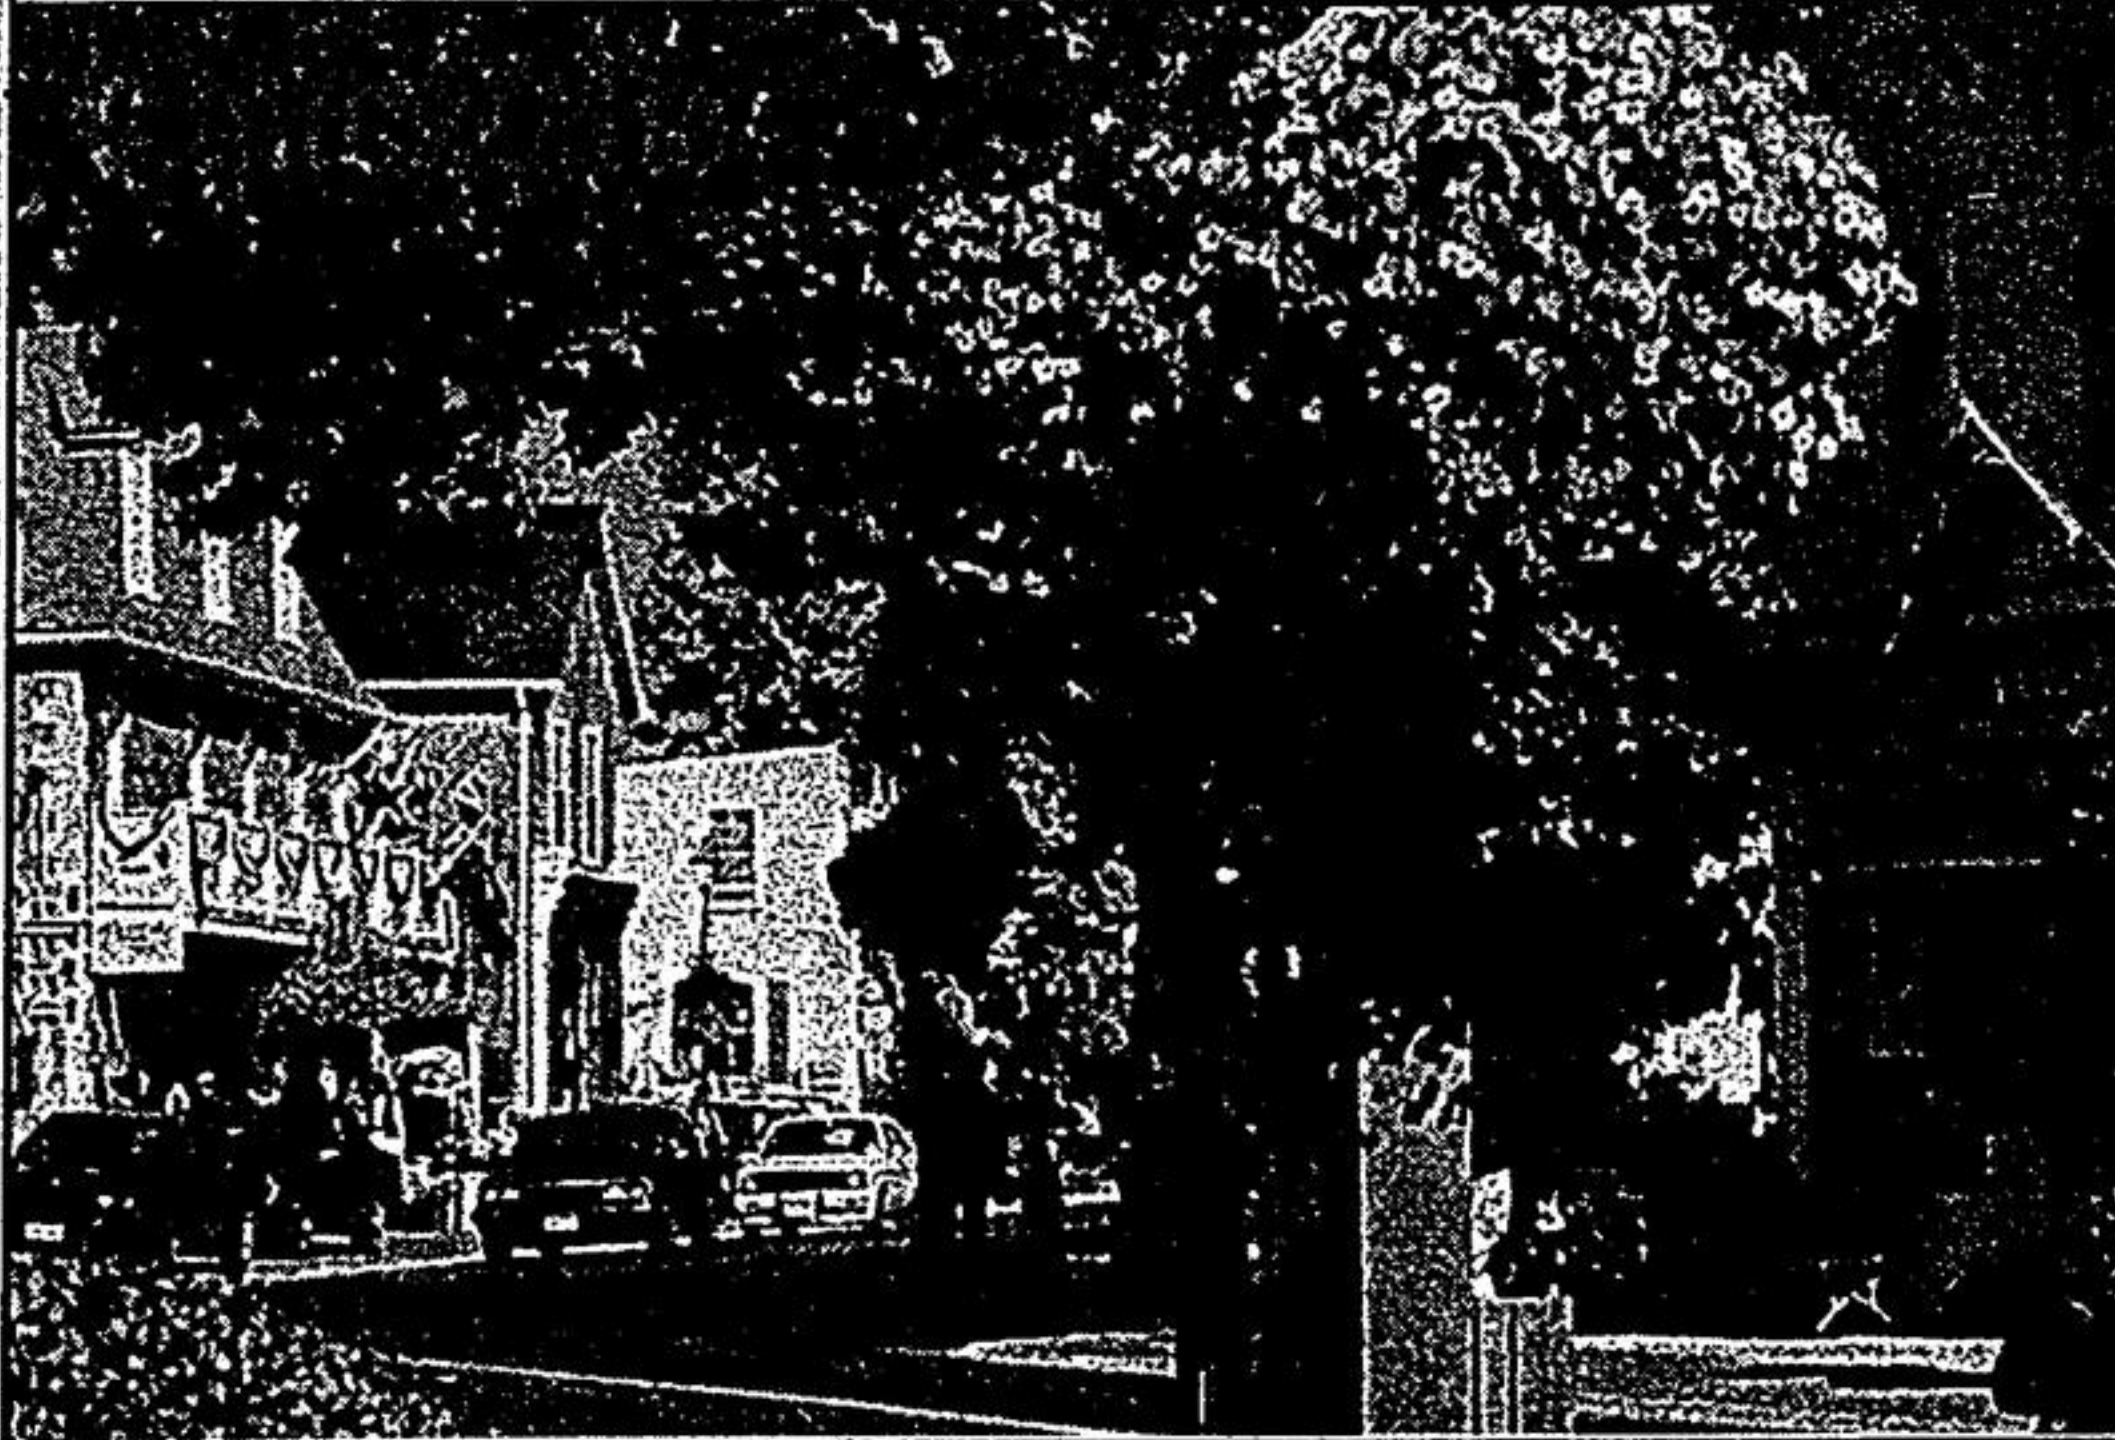

"It fits in nicely with the trend towards more casual dressing at work. You can wear the diamond solitaire necklace anytime. It's truly the ideal piece," said Kulesza.

The excitement surrounding solitaire style is not limited to Canada. In Italy, where the diamond solitaire necklace is known as The Venus Diamond, consumers are spending millions of dollars on this radiant piece.

Even high-profile models and actresses are making solitaire splashes of their own. Kate Moss, Gwyneth Paltrow and Jodie Foster are just a handful of celebrities who've been seen sporting a single diamond. And they're wearing it everywhere, with everything - jeans, a business suit or a little black dress.

"People are more discriminating now," said Kim Sutch of De Beers' Diamond Information Centre. "They want something that endures - that combines ageless style with value. And nothing says value more than a timeless, fashionable piece that you put on and never take off. That's what Canadian women want - a quality signature piece that is dazzling without being obvious."
