

Son walks line between good and horrid

From Where I Live

Bruce Stapley

I think Hank Ketcham had our son, Griffin, in mind when he conceived the now-legendary comic strip Dennis the Menace all those years ago.

That thought came to mind when I recently happened across a syndicated Dennis offering. In it the holy terror, clad as always in overalls, is standing on the seat of his little rocking chair in the corner of a room. Obviously, the two have been placed there for disciplinary purposes. Clinging to the chair's upper back section and facing the room in which his parents have sought refuge, he is attempting to implicate his mother and father. "If you're raisin' me right, HOW COME I GET INTO SO MUCH TROUBLE?" he bellows.

The scene reminded me of Griffin's own manipulative tactic of trying to get out of eating his supper by pointing to his time-out step at the bottom of the stairs and insisting he go there on his own in what he hopes will be taken as an act of pure penitence.

Griffin and Dennis even look a little alike. Both have that tousled, sticking-out-all-over-the-place shock of blonde hair. They have a similar bang-bang approach to life, and are seemingly impervious to the constant scratches, bumps and bruises they are forever acquiring.

Griffin turned two this week, the age when all moms and dads begin to wonder just what they were thinking when they decided to give up peaceful dinners with just the two of them, sleeping in on weekends, and orderliness in the house in exchange for an extra branch on the family tree. Griffin has been serving notice for weeks now that he intends to fully fulfill the obligations of the terrible twos. These include throwing sudden tantrums, saying no before even listening to Susan and my desperate pleas for compliance; and attempting to insert his grubby little fingers in his five-year-old brother's eye sockets.

As if on cue, the little fellow staged a mini tantrum upon my wife Susan's dressing him and bringing him downstairs for his customary morning tea to start off his birthday. He eventually pulled himself together, however, and proceeded to exhibit the other-side of his "little girl" with the little/curl dichotomy.

The theme for Griff's birthday was Thomas the Tank Engine, the English railway-video series that has proved so popular for tots over the past several years. Susan had worked her usual birthday cake magic. This time, her inspired four-part effort included James the Red Engine, Bertie the Bus, and the Fat Controller.

Upon having the lit-up cake placed down in front of him, Griffin immediately pounced upon the masterpiece, scooping up two handfuls of icing and everything lying underneath. We managed to restrain him, and his mother and a few other relatives demonstrated the art of forcefully extinguishing the candles in a manner he could gleefully imitate. The presents were finally brought out, and with some help from his big brother, Griffin waded through new acquisitions. The loot included a slew of Thomas paraphernalia, along with the usual bunny rabbit slippers, cars and theme pajamas.

Griffin, who has so often found himself the butt end of jokes from his mom and dad suggesting his blonde hair may have affected his intelligence level, drew gasps of awe from his grandparents when he immediately and correctly placed all five pieces of a wooden Thomas puzzle into their places.

This impressive little display of innate competence simply served to reinforce what Susan and I have been suspecting for some time now. Just like Dennis the Menace, Griff will always have the last laugh.
