Don't let dad's memories be forgotten

When talking with his 88-year-old father about their family, Joe Barnett was shaken by the realization that he knew nothing about his great-grandparents. He didn't know where they lived, what their occupations were or even names.

According to a Gallup survey, commissioned by Pathway Publishing House Inc., Barnett is not alone. The survey reveals elders are soon forgotten. In the national survey, Gallup asked 1,005 adults if they knew the first names and occupations of their great-grandparents. More than 60 per cent did not know the names of any of their great-grandparents, and more than 40 per cent did not know the occupations of any of their great-grandparents.

At last, there is an answer. "I don't like the thought of third-generation obscurity," said Barnett. "I don't want my parents to be forgotten in 50 years, to be unknown to their great-grandchildren."

So, when Barnett's father asked him what he wanted to inherit, he said, "I want your memories."

He began compiling questions for his parents to answer. "My interest was not in a family tree," Barnett says. "I wanted to know things like what their first school house was like, what they wanted to be when they grew up, how long it took to travel 30 miles when they were children and how much their first job paid."

When Barnett finished, there were 1,175 memory-jogging questions organized into three sections: Personal and Family History, Life Cycles and Historical Events. After people started asking for copies for their own families, Barnett decided to publish his questions in a book, Memories for My Loved Ones.

Note: There are many books available on the market like this one and can be found in most bookstores.
