

York Region force still without permanent chief

York Regional Police officers are anxiously awaiting an announcement naming their new chief.

But there's still no word on when the police services board will choose a replacement for Bryan Cousineau, who took early retirement in February.

King Mayor Margaret Black, a board member, said Monday a consultant was still doing background checks on some of the candidates.

"I have no news. I don't know when we'll make an announcement," she said. "I wish it was resolved, but it isn't yet."

Earlier, Black said the nine candidates the board has interviewed were all "very worthy."

None stood out in her mind as being more capable than the others.

The search for a new chief began about six weeks ago when the board hired management consultants KPMG to help it come up with a short list of candidates. More than 20 candidates, including three from within the force, applied for the job, which pays about $135,000 per year. The chief's job became available Feb. 5, when Cousineau was charged with five counts of breach of trust. He makes his fifth pre-trial court appearance June 22.

Only OPP Supt. Wayne Frechette has publicly announced his interest in the job.
