Daycare dilemma a stress

programs for the girls and is close to Wee Care daycare centre, where Marlena still goes two days a week.

Where a child attends school often influences daycare decisions in York Region, where spaces are at a premium.

With Rita and Bill working full time, daycare is an issue, and although they didn't have a tough time finding a spot for Marlena, the financial reality still hits home. Daycare costs the Byres $800 a month.

Julie and Victor learned about the demand for daycare in the region only after Charlie was born and they realized what many parents in York Region already know — you have to get your name on a waiting list as soon as you become pregnant.

Of the 12,000 licensed child care spaces in York Region, there are only 224 spaces for babies. Julie ended up placing Charlie in private care, but it's a solution not all families can afford.

In 1996, 479 families with children under the age of 18 months were waiting for subsidized child care in the region. With only 224 licensed centre-based infant spaces available (107 are subsidized), the demand greatly outweighs the supply.

A report made to the York Region public school board recently indicated that daycare supervisors suffer stress from communicating with emotionally distraught mothers who cannot find child care and must return to work.

"That's where we see the stress," said Gayle Whitehead of the public school board's community services department. "When the mothers come to the centres with their babies in their arms and they need child care but all there is is a waiting list."
