Regions to share copters

Under mounting pressure to find an alternative to high-speed police chases, the York and Durham forces may share two helicopters as part of a pilot project.

Officers believe the pilot project will convince politicians that helicopters should be added to the forces' permanent arsenal against crime.

The program is part of the province's Helicopter Pilot Project, aimed at providing choppers to police departments in the Greater Toronto Area and Golden Horseshoe.

According to York Police Chief Julian Fantino, the province has indicated it is willing to contribute funding, although he didn't specify how much.

He also couldn't pinpoint the cost of buying helicopters, saying the price could vary widely depending on the specifications. Fantino said the forces could lease the helicopters — which would cost a "couple of hundred thousand dollars a year" — and would look to the private sector and the community for contributions.

Yesterday, the York police services board backed the plan, instructed Fantino to further investigate and authorized him to raise money.

A foundation which will operate at arms' length from the board, will administer the helicopter fund.

Fantino believes helicopters are safer for both bystanders and officers.
